Our Glorious Triumph

San Francisco experienced a great thrill of joy when from Washington came the glad tidings that we had won the first battle in the contest for the World's Fair. That contest had kept us more or less on edge for weeks. As we were all sensible of the tremendous importance of victory, of the great loss that we should suffer through defeat, the whole community was keyed up to a high pitch of anxiety, and when through the cannon mouth came to eager ears the transporting news of triumph the city was swept with grateful emotion. That perennial citizen, the oldest inhabitant, probably informed the man that winds up the ferry clock that no such ecstasy had been experienced hereabouts since that memorable steamer day on which the old flag was unfurled on Portsmouth Square to signalize the admission of California to the Union. And certain it is that of all the red-letter days that have occurred in California since the bear flag went out of official business last Tuesday was the reddest. A world's fair in San Francisco will mark the opening of a new and pregnant epoch not only for the metropolis of the West but for the whole State. So enormous are the benefits that are bound to accrue from the Fair that an approximate estimate of them is beyond the powers of the most optimistic of rainbow prophets. The material benefits in store for us are not greater than the spiritual benefits. For a great fair such as we are to hold will bring with it many refining and educational influences that will be felt by all the people. We have been told that the aftermath of a world's fair is depressing, but the Pacific-Panama Exposition is to be exceptional. We are not to commemorate anything. We are to celebrate a great national achievement which is to bear fruit at the very time when all the belts of civilization will be intersecting along our avenues, when a new cosmopolitanism will be burgeoning in our midst, when all our industries, all our higher faculties will be receiving a new impetus. There will be no retrogression thereafter. The movement will be onward, upward and irresistible. The Pacific is mankind's New Theatre. In its multitudinous seas are to be re-enacted those great scenes that marked the progress of history, first along the shores of the Mediterranean and then upon the tempestuous Atlantic.

Fools and Knaves at Sacramento

The indications are that at the close of this session of the Legislature California will have her bellyful of reform. No State in the Union was ever threatened with so direful consequences of rash and blundering incompetency as those which are now portended by the crazy projects that have been broached at Sacramento. Perhaps before adjournment "reform" and "anarchy" will have become synonymous terms in California because if the reformers at Sacramento are to have their way the government of this State will soon be what Anarchists pronounce the ideal government. For Anarchists hold that the best government is the worst since the best government is the farthest removed from disorder and dissolution. Now the converse of the proposition is that the worst government is the best, and apparently that is the consummation for which our zealous fanatics at Sacramento are striving. They are the most destructive band of statesmen that ever assembled in this or any other State in the world's history. If this assertion appears extravagant try to recall an historical instance of a deliberative body that exhibited anything approximating the contempt of recognized essential principles of government which is evinced in the present session of our Legislature. There have been several market democracies but in none of them was it ever proposed to make justice a matter of public opinion. This proposal is of course the most vicious of all the fantastic innovations which our statesmen are considering. It is in itself fatal to government as any person is aware who can see beyond the length of his nose. It ought to be sufficient to satisfy the most rabid anarchist. The spirit in which this measure was conceived is apparently characteristic of the Legislature, for there are other measures under consideration which rather argue the mischievousness and recklessness of defiant bullyism than the awkwarkness of unconscious incompetency. Take for example the proposal to validate and make constitutional at a special election all the acts of the Legislature. The proponents of this measure candidly admit that they consider it advisable to rush the amendments to the people while the wave of hysterical reform is washing over the State because on second thought the masses may conclude to be conservative. In other words it is the purpose of our statesmen, a purpose which they openly proclaim, to catch the people unaware, to take advantage of their passions before they have time to cool off and bring their sober judgment to bear on questions of the most vital importance. Where is there to be found in all history a parallel for such barefaced official depravity? This certainly affords us an insight into the character of some of the men who are legislating for us at Sacramento. And having this insight we should not be amazed at any of the strange devices which they are constructing. We are reminded by their frankness of Hazlitt's observation that he was always afraid of a fool because he could never be sure that he was not a knave. Obviously there are men making laws at Sacramento who are at once both fools and knaves; a very dangerous combination even though the fool may sometimes expose himself to execration by unconsciously revealing his own rascality. This combination with its plans for amplifying the tyrannical powers of organized labor, giving our greedy job-holders the right to blackmail everybody in business and keeping the people incessantly engaged in politics, is likely to work more harm in California in a few months than was wrought by machine politicians in all her previous history.

Emulating Arizona

Now that our Legislature is inclined to revolutionize the State government by infusing into the organic law all the fads and fancies that have been conceived by the quack philosophers and paranoiac patriots of the Chautauquan School it might be well to consider the attitude of President Taft toward Arizona. This is of interest to us because we have been getting inspiration from that wild and wooly territory. Let it not be supposed that all the ideas of the current dispensation have been borrowed from the bleeding commonwealth of Kansas and the riproaring State of Oklahoma. Some have come from Tucson, others from Tombstone. In one or the other of those cultured burgs was conceived the idea of making judges responsive to the will of the masses, and it is now embodied in the Constitution of Arizona, a circumstance which in all probability will delay the admission of that State to the Union. When Theodore Roosevelt was President in spite of his progressiveness he could not stomach the radical features of the Oklahoma Constitution, but he protested in vain. To prevent a repetition of the calamity the enabling acts for Arizona and New Mexico were so worded that the State Constitutions must be approved by Congress before they can become valid. Now President Taft does not approve the Arizona Constitution. He is especially opposed to the recall for judges, and he takes the ground that it is not consistent with a republican form of government. If his position be correct then perhaps a recall for judges will be futile, for one of the things guaranteed by the Federal Constitution is the preservation of the republican form of government in every State. That President Taft's position is correct we have no doubt since we know that to make judges the puppets of the masses is to do away with justice which is the primary essential principle of all government. How can there be such a thing as due process of law in a State where the law doesn't matter?

Deliberate Statesmanship

When the Supreme Court decided to grant Abe Ruef a rehearing great was the impetus given to the sentiment behind the proposal to apply the recall to the judiciary. As soon as the news of the decision reached Sacramento several of the giant intellects that give lustre and distinction to the legislative body perceived at once the inherent virtue of the principle of administering justice by counting noses. Senator Miguel Estudillo of Riverside, who is doubtless a worthy representative of the intelligence and goodness of his constituents, seized the decision as a pretext for his conversion to the views of the great panjandrum who distributes patronage. "I was opposed to the measure," he said, "but now it has my hearty approval." Similarly Senator Ernest Birdsall of Auburn: "I was strongly opposed to the recall on judges, but this Ruef decision is too much." Also Senator Lee Gates of Los Angeles, who is an attorney but whose practice is not so large as to keep him at home: "The decision proves the necessity of the action recommended by the Governor." Also Senator Hurd of Los Angeles: "No argument on earth can now convince me that the recall on judges is not a crying necessity." Thus are we permitted to glimpse the mental processes of some fine specimens of the kind of talent in which the sovereign people love to repose their priceless confidence. From the utterances which we have quoted it appears that our impetuous statesmen are as easily swayed by their prejudices as the most capricious of their constituents. Convinced that Ruef should go to the penitentiary they are in favor of pitchforking him there regardless of law. We are not astonished that this should be their sentiment, but we are astonished that any of them should ever have been opposed to the recall of judges. Our astonishment is due to our instinct for the logical. These statesmen tell us they are now in favor of the recall because the Supreme Court has done something contrary to what they think should have been done. This being so it is clear they should always have been for the recall. For the purpose of the recall is to deter judges from exercising their own judgment and inducing them to decide cases according to the opinion of Tom, Dick and Harry. The principle of the recall is that Tom, Dick and Harry who know nothing of a case except what they read in the newspapers are more likely to be right than judges who are versed in the science of law and familiar with the evidence. And undoubtedly Senators Estudillo, Birdsall, Gates and Hurd are convinced of the soundness of this principle. Their conviction is attested by their assumption that they know it was wrong to grant Ruef a rehearing. They did not attend his trial and they do not know what the facts are, but they do know he ought to be in the penitentiary and that is sufficient for them. They agree of course with Senator Cartwright who tells us that the law has been set aside by the Supreme Court. Senator Cartwright knows this by intuition. The Supreme Justices who have read some of the record, which it is hardly likely that Senator Cartwright has ever seen, are of the opinion that possibly it was Judge Lawlor who set the law aside, but their opinion being contrary to the opinion of Tom, Dick and Harry it follows that there is crying necessity for the recall. Perhaps these statesmen might again be made to change their views by giving each of them a trial such as Ruef had.

Amending the Criminal Law

So many are the defects of our system of justice and so notorious is it that criminals break through the meshes of the law that nobody is insensible of the need of reform. All agree that something should be done to make Justice less erring and to prevent the further decrease of public respect for the law and the courts. But as is usually the case when the people become impatient of anything that deserves their reprobation, to escape the ills they cannot bear they fly to others they know not of. This appears to be the tendency with reference to the abuses of the criminal law. The reformers are acting on two theories that are absolutely erroneous: first, that the trial courts are all right and the higher courts all wrong; secondly, that while guilty men escape innocent men are never sent to the penitentiary. The absurdity of the first proposition ought to be apparent to anybody capable of exercising the faculty of thought. The trial courts are the schools in which we educate our judges, and to the criminal courts are assigned the least competent men. Many of the lawyers elected to the Superior Court are men of no experience. On the other hand never is an inexperienced lawyer, seldom is an inexperienced judge, elected to one of the appellate courts. Of course this system so far as it affects our trial courts is all wrong. In this system are rooted nearly all the evils of which we complain. Our criminal cases are tried by men who are ignorant of the science of law, and whose blunders which usually result from an absorbing desire to make a record for convictions necessitate reversals, the result being that between the first and second trials witnesses disappear and the guilty go free. As to the theory that innocent men are never convicted instances disproving it have frequently come to light, and of course it is not unreasonable to assume that there are cases of which the public has never heard. Lawyers and penologists will tell you that in about ninety per cent of the convictions in rape cases the men are the victims of conspiracy. On the theory that justice is to be improved by making it easier to convict it is proposed to give our undergraduates of the bench and our prosecuting attorneys more power, to reduce the number of challenges allowed to the defense and to empower nine jurors to render a verdict. Now the purpose of the first proposal is to neutralize the ignorance of juridical officers, to give them so much latitude that it will be difficult for them to make fatal blunders. This of course will have the effect of reducing the number of reversals, but it will set us back a few centuries. How far the proponents of the measure are from appreciating its character we learn from their statement that they merely wish to give our judges the same power that English judges have. They forget that English judges are independent both of the people and the Crown, that they have no incentive to a record for anything but the calm and sober administration of the law. They forget also that whereas in England no newspaper ever comments on a case in court, nearly all our sensational criminal cases are tried by the press, and that our trial judges take their cue from the newspapers. Whether the three-fourths verdict will improve justice remains to be seen, but meantime it may be well to consider the views on this subject expressed by Justice Sloss, the least experienced of our appellate judges, a man who never practiced criminal law or tried a criminal case. "I do not find," he says, "that the verdict of nine jurors in a civil case is regarded as any less binding or any less likely to be right than the unanimous verdict of twelve in a criminal case. I see no reason why this rule should not work equally well in a criminal case, at least in all cases except such as, upon conviction, are punishable with death or life imprisonment." Judge Sloss's sentiments are hardly in harmony either with the spirit of the times or the traditional maxims of the law. The spirit of the times demands that we put man above merchandise, and the traditional maxims of the law are very much in accord with that spirit favoring as they do a special principle in criminal practice designed to shield from error every man accused of crime. It is somewhat singular that Judge Sloss should hold the views that he has expressed, for evidently he believes that a unanimous verdict is more to be relied upon than a "three-fourths verdict." Else why should he object to the "three-fourths verdict" when the defendant may be punished by death or life imprisonment? Does he think it of no consequence that an innocent citizen of this country should be sent to jail for six months or for sixteen years?

To the Lady of the Poplars

By Seumas O'Sullivan

A song for you, a song I made
  Of glimmering moons and moon-white ways,
And branches woven into shade
  Where quiet goes; to make your praise,
I sought in these, and dreams of these,
My Lady of the Poplar trees.

Ah, deeper quiet he must seek,
  And deeper-shadowed ways I ween,
Peace hidden of no earthly trees,
  Radiance no earthly moon has seen,
He must seek out who sings to please
My Lady of the Poplar trees.

A Man of Letters

By Theodore Bonnet

George Brandes writing of Anatole France says that the true author is recognizable by the existence on every page of his works of something which no one else could have written. And he quotes this as a specimen of France's unique workmanship: "If we may believe that amiable shepherd of souls it is impossible for us to elude divine mercy, and we shall all enter Paradise—unless, indeed, there be no Paradise, which is exceedingly probable." This is typical of the French wit and satirist, but France is not the only man who could have written it. Ambrose Bierce could have written it. Ambrose Bierce is the most versatile genius in American letters. He is a man of letters in the broadest acceptation of the term. He has rippled almost every stream of the Pierian fount. There is but one form of the literary art that he has not touched—the dramatic. He is poet, philosopher, historian, novelist and essayist. He has produced masterpieces of the art of short-story writing—tales of terror and psychological tales that none but a Poe could have written; fables and allegories—some in the vein of Lucian, some after the manner of Swift, some as grotesque as any that were ever written; satirical verses as epigrammatic, pungent and compact as Pope's; comic sketches as funny as Mark Twain's; historical narratives more lucid and entertaining than any I have ever read. Bierce unites in himself the genius of many authors, but like Boileau he is original even in imitation. He has comprehended in his works the whole world of satire fusing all that he gathered into a mixture which has its own flavor, its own spirit and taste, approximating some writers even in the very qualities for which they were distinguished. Above all things Bierce is a satirist, and in some respects the quality of his satire resembles Anatole France's. Both have written in the same vein. Compare for example the following with what Brandes has quoted: "A religious work says that Christ should be held up as an example to the church. We have somewhere read that he was once held up very conspicuously as an example to the church. That was eighteen hundred years ago, and the church has not imitated him yet. We don't think it is of any use to put him up again." Here is another: "I confess I do not understand the one-half that is written about faith. This is probably because I have it not. An eyeless fish from the Mammoth Cave cannot be expected to know much about optical science, but at least he may boast himself free from optical illusions." Bierce has written some things which France could not write. This, for instance, written in the days when a Governor of this State was pardoning criminals by wholesale:

"God said 'Let there be crime,' and the command Brought Satan leading Stoneman by the hand."

Nor could France have written this epigram entitled "Novum Organum":

In Bacon see the culminating prime
Of British intellect and British crime.
He died, and Nature, settling his affairs,
Parted his powers among us, his heirs:
To each a pinch of common sense, for seed,
And, to develop it, a pinch of greed.
Each frugal heir, to make the gift suffice,
Buries the talent to manure the vice.

There are not many people to share my enenthusiasm for Bierce. There are not many that have read half that he has written. Now that his works have been collected and are coming from the press of Neale & Company of New York and Washington perhaps this man who has been writing for forty years will emerge from obscurity before he dies. That he will ever become popular is of course not to be expected. Writers who require active intelligence and taste in their readers never become popular. They merely become classic. If to be a classic is, as Sainte-Beuve asserts, to be an author who has enriched the human mind, increased its treasure and rendered his thought in a style of his own which is at the same time a model of excellence then Bierce has been a classic for many years. And he has yet to receive universal recognition! This is not strange. Had it been otherwise, in Bierce's case, that would have been extraordinary. For we are not as the Early Victorians whom we unjustly regard as unenlightened, narrowly conventional and Philistine. Considering, as an English essayist has recently observed, that Carlyle, Tennyson, Thackeray and Browning were popular, not after their death but in their prime, it must have been a high level of taste that rapidly acclaimed them. But nowadays many cases may be cited to prove that the man who puts any pressure on his readers' power of thought writes for the few; also, that as in most periods it is only mediocrity that can achieve popularity. How slow was the growth of Ibsen, the man that revolutionized the modern drama! Even now to admire him is to be suspected of being a highbrow. The popular taste is now for novels, but George Meredith hasn't been dead long enough to have his works ranked with the standards of fiction. But there are circumstances other than the obtuseness of the general to which must be attributed the neglect of Bierce. His intrinsic merit alone does not account for his obscurity. Perhaps the chief reason why he has not tasted the sweets of fame or walked with outward glory crowned is that he is a satirist. His has been the fate of many of the great satirists. Worshipped by the few whom he has cared to call his friends, he has provoked widespread fear and malignity, and the men who might have spread his fame have been eager to prevent the world from knowing of his existence.

Like all great satirists Bierce is a moralist who hates cant and hypocrisy above all other sins, and early in his career he seized the thong with genuine impulses and applied it to the pelts of the Pharisees with ardent enthusiasm. He has seen life moreover as Meredith described it—a supreme ironic procession with laughter of the gods in the background, and it has been his pleasure to keep the pageant moving. The absurdities and defects of everything that has come under his notice he has exposed to ridicule and contempt as but one other living man can, that one being Anatole France. Every genuine human grievance, every downright human folly quickens Bierce into animation. Possessed of a mind analytic and destructive the shattering of shams is his delight. Equipped with the stilettos of speech and all the resources of irony and ridicule he loves to play havoc with follies; with the presumption of criticasters, the impertinence of logrollers, the pretension of literary mediocrities. So among the citizenry of the Republic of Letters there are few who have any enthusiasm for Bierce. Many hate him with good reason, not all readers have the intelligence to appreciate him, and few have but more than a vague knowledge of his works, for most of Bierce's writing was done in the provinces. It is only now that Bierce's writings are being collected and printed. I have received the first three volumes, and there are seven more to come. In the first of the three are some masterly satirical allegories in which are pictured for us new worlds of fancy and humor; some beautiful historical sketches dealing with battles of the Rebellion in which the author figured as a staff officer; and a philosophical monograph on the decline and fall of the American Republic written in the year 4930. In this last mentioned performance we get much of the farce and mummery of political life as none perhaps but Bierce could give them to us, revealing as he does his familiarity with the science of government and illustrating the weaknesses of our system with far-fetched conceits, flippant jests, grotesque absurdities, quaint burlesque and delicious travesty. Bierce's contempt of democracy is as bitter as Lucian's. The futility of it he points out in this paragraph:

"To us of today it is clear that the word 'self-government' involves a contradiction, for government means control by something other than the thing to be controlled. When the thing governed is the same as the thing governing there is no government, though for a time there may be, as in the case under consideration there was, a considerable degree of forbearance giving a misleading appearance of public order. This, however, soon must, as in fact it soon did, pass away with the delusion that gave it birth. The habit of obedience to written law, inculcated by generations of respect for actual government able to enforce its authority, will persist for a long time, with an ever lessening power on the imagination of the people; but there comes a time when the tradition is forgotten and the delusion exhausted. When men perceive that nothing is restraining them but their consent to be restrained, then at last there is nothing to obstruct the free play of that selfishness which is the dominant characteristic and fundamental motive of human nature and human action respectively. Politics, which may have had something of the character of a contest of principles, becomes a struggle of interests, and its methods are frankly serviceable to personal and class advantage. Patriotism and respect for law pass like a tale that is told. Anarchy, no longer disguised as 'government by consent,' reveals his hidden hand, and in the words of our greatest living poet,

'lets the curtain fall,
And universal darkness buries all!'"

Here is a bit of drollery that is typical:

"A little later nearly all classes and callings became organized conspiracies each seeking an unfair advantage through laws which the party in power had not the firmness to withhold, nor the party hoping for power the courage to oppose. The climax of absurdity in this direction was reached in 1918 when an association of barbers, known as Noblemen of the Razor, procured from the parliament of the country a law giving it a representative in the President's Cabinet and making it a misdemeanor to wear a beard."

That combination of brutal cynicism and sardonic humor which is characteristic of Bierce is

VII—EDWARD M. GREENWAY

By Edward F. O'Day

Gentle reader, do you remember Kohler and Frohling's liquor store? Whether you do or whether you do not, you will probably see no reason to dispute the statement that it was once a place of very especial resort. If you had happened to be in Kohler and Frohling's about four o'clock one sunny afternoon just twenty-five years ago, you would have noticed the entrance of a very dapper young man with a round face, small keen brown eyes and a slight mustache. You would have noticed that he approached the bartender, nodded a salute, arrayed one graceful foot upon the rail and said in a quick but pleasing voice:

"John, a little of that port."

If you had happened to maintain an interest in this by no means extraordinary proceeding, you would have noticed that the bartender took down a bottle and enriched a small wine glass with its ruddy contents, that the dapper young man held it before the light for the gratification of his eye, swept it slowly before his face for the titillation of his sense of smell and then tilted it over his tongue for the propitiation of his palate. Then you would have watched the dapper young man bring the glass sharply down upon the polished mahogany and you would have heard him exclaim:

"John, you've switched the bottle on me."

And then in a corner you would have seen a head emerge from behind a rustling newspaper, the while a voice exclaimed in an accent of surprise:

"What's that? What's that?"

* * * * *

Let us now turn, gentle reader, from Kohler and Frohling's liquor store in Montgomery street to the stately old home of the Gwins in South Park, still imagining ourselves younger by twenty-five years. It is the night of a grand ball and all the beauty and chivalry of San Francisco are in attendance. We find the same dapper young man in the brilliant ball room and as it is his introduction to San Francisco society, he is very carefully dressed. Let us suppose that he stands for a moment surveying the charming scene before him and that his thoughts are interrupted by a hand upon his shoulder. He finds himself confronted by a tall, handsome, soldierly man of middle age who regards him with a keen but kindly eye.

"Young man," demanded the elderly stranger, "did your grandfather ever mention to you the names of his three best friends?"

"Yes, sir," answered our dapper youth; "he mentioned them many times. They were General Scott, General Albert Sydney Johnstone and General Keyes."

And the stranger answered:

"I am General Keyes."

* * * * *

"That first incident," explains Edward M. Greenway—for our dapper youth is none other—"proved that I had a taste for wine; it was my introduction to the wine business. The second incident proved that I had a grandfather; it was the beginning of my social career."

Edward Macdonald Greenway was born in New York in 1851. His ancestry is interesting and significant. In the dark backward and abysm of time the Greenways were Vikings who ravaged the coast of Britain and drained the mead cup to their war god Thor. In much later years the Macdonalds were Scottish cavaliers who fought for Bonny Prince Charlie by day and finished their four bottles every night. And at the beginning of American history the forebears of our hero settled in Virginia and began to multiply and spread to Maryland and New York and Tennessee. So you see Ned is not alone in having a grandfather; his grandfather had one too. At the age of four Greenway was taken to Baltimore and lived there until 1875, just two dozen years. Very interesting years they were, as Ned is very frank in confessing. For a good part of the time he was tutored by a Scotch minister who endeavored to ferule some of the joy of living out of his charge, but failed most dismally. Then he went to St. John's College at Annapolis. He stayed there for three and a half years, spending three years in the freshman class and half a year as a sophomore. "What did I take?" says Ned.

EDWARD M. GREENWAY

"I took football and rowing. My chum and I made a vow that we would not open a book until we rowed our first race with the Naval Academy, so they fired us." No whit discouraged Ned returned to Baltimore and joined a rowing club. It was a pleasant life, especially in spring; for in that sweet season he spent every other night at the boat club, arising at four in the morning to pursue the soft shell crab. It was a life gladdened with Maryland fried chicken and corn cakes, with broiled oysters—("You can't broil the California oysters," says Ned)—and sweetbread croquets and last but not least, with "pins and pain" as they used to call it, terrapin and champagne. Ned, you see, was taking his post-collegiate course as a bibeur and a gourmet. His eyes flash when he speaks of that joyous period and words can scarcely express his contempt for the Philadelphia recipe for preparing terrapin.

Ned was a Democrat and he cast his first three votes for Horace Greeley. I said his first three votes, for on his initiation into citizenship he voted three times—just to get the hang of the thing, no doubt—once for his uncle, once for his grandfather and once for himself. And being a great admirer of Horace the time came when he resolved to follow the celebrated Horatian advice, to turn his back on soft shell chabs and terrapin and head for the alluring West. He had friends out here, among them Louis McLane and General Stoneman and having inherited some money, he resolved in a curious groping after a destiny that was not yet ripe, to become a grape-grower. Greenway's family tree may be a grape-vine, but there is no pruning-knife on his coat of arms. So after a short stay at the Stoneman place in San Gabriel he came to San Francisco in 1875 looking for employment. He asked his friend McLane to place him in the Nevada Bank, but it was just after the failure of the Bank of California and the Big Four—Flood, Mackay, Fair and O'Brien—had berthed all their friends in the Nevada Bank and there was only the job of messenger left. Greenway took it and after a month of legging was made receiving teller and later collection clerk. He stayed in the Nevada for five years and was let out with Edward H. Sheldon and seven others when the Brander-Angus combination was made. Then for five years he was clearing house clerk for the Anglo, but was fired when the papers announced that Edward M. Greenway, the popular society amateur, was receiving instructions from George Osborne and would appear at the California Theater as a professional actor in "Hoodman Blind." Perhaps Ned might be an ornament of the stage today if he had not happened to meet James C. Flood ("the best friend I ever had in my life," says Greenway). Flood persuaded Greenway to take a position in the office of the Ophir Mining Company, a position he held for about seven years.

It was shortly after his arrival that the incident at the Gwin ball opened to Greenway the most exclusive drawing rooms of the city. He became the friend of Mrs. Lloyd Tevis and Mrs. J. B. Haggin, of the Mills', the Coltons and the Crockers and when Edward Sheldon started the Bachelors' Cotillon, he joined it. After two years Sheldon turned the club over to Ned and he has been running it ever since. It was not long afterwards that Charles Kohler discovered through the other incident I have narrated that Ned had an accurate taste for wines and he used to call him in to decide nice questions concerning the comparative excellence of different vintages. By the time that the Midwinter Fair came along Ned had the reputation of a connoisseur and he was made one of the judges of wines. Soon afterwards he met the New York representative of the Mumm people and was made Pacific Coast representative.

Times have changed since Ned started to manage the Bachelors' Cotillon Club. He gave his first german in old B'nai B'rith Hall which, according to Ned, had the best dancing floor in the city. It was a very scrumptious affair. The subscription for the season was ten dollars and the first supper cost one dollar a cover—and that included champagne, for the first time in the dancing history of the city. It was an elaborate supper too, Mrs. Fair contributing the shrimp salad. Ned led the german with Miss Tessie Fair, afterwards

The Mysterious Press

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I see that the newspapers are having another spasm of morality. They are terribly shocked at the police for permitting gambling games to run. They regard faro as a device of Satan's and craps as the most diabolical of all forbidden pastimes. How about lottery? Is lottery a Christian game? Is it edifying? Is it conducive to morality? Has it the sanction of law? Is it a gospel sport conducted by the clergy for the benefit of the church? I ask these questions because I notice that while the sensitive dailies are greatly opposed to faro and craps they never print anything about the lotteries except the winning numbers. Evidently the dailies have no objection to lottery, for there are three lottery companies in this city and all of them pay tribute to the dailies "for advertising." Perhaps the ethical test by which the character of a gambling game is determined is the one applied by the business managers of the dailies. Perhaps the answer to the question, "Do you advertise?" is the criterion. Perhaps if the faro dealers advertised their business after the manner of theatrical managers the newspapers would look elsewhere for pretexts for moral spasms. I make these suggestions, Mr. Editor, in the hope that they may incite you to entertaining reflection. I would like some light on a subject which is to me a profound and abstruse but nevertheless interesting subject. I don't know anything about the newspaper business, but I ponder it frequently and wonder at its mysteries. All editors I believe are good men bowed beneath a great load of responsibility. I believe, too, that there is something divine about them so inscrutable are their ways and motives.

Yours truly,
—Mortimer L. Hunt.

The Ugly Inference

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I read in the Bulletin the other evening this statement: "Citizens who have kept track of Supreme Court decisions predicted that if that body gave Ruef a rehearing his respite would come from Justices Beatty, Lorigan, Henshaw and Melvin, sometimes referred to as the 'Big Four.'" I have not kept track of Supreme Court decisions, but I keep track of the Bulletin and of Town Talk and I read in the latter journal recently some paragraphs that astonished about the reconciliation between Justice Sloss and Judge Dunne, and about the Bulletin's change of attitude toward Sloss, Angellotti and Shaw, and though I had given no thought to the Ruef decision I was not at all surprised that the little trio did not join in it. It is most lamentable if the state of affairs in our Supreme Court is what the Bulletin hints that it is. It would be especially lamentable if that journal was able to predict the Ruef decision, for the inference to be drawn from such a circumstance is most hideous. The inference is that the Supreme Court leaks, and in this instance of course it is not to be supposed that the Bulletin found a leak among the four justices whose characters it continues to blacken after having forgiven the other three that had long enjoyed its hostility. I am not acquainted with any of our judges, but I am from Nevada where the reputation of Chief Justice Beatty still survives, and if I were on the Supreme Court bench I would rather be wrong with him than right with any of his associates.

Yours respectively,
San Francisco, January 28. —Sage Brush.

No Sleeping in the River

It is a good sign when Los Angeles does not take itself too seriously. It is also a rare sign. Many Los Angeles people undoubtedly resent the following bit of pleasantry which appeared in the columns of the Los Angeles Express. The only crime which would surpass it in heinousness would be a joke at the expense of the great San Pedro harbor, which Guy Buham one proposed to irrigate, and where President Taft got stuck in the mud. Says the Express:

"From the 'Abstract of the Official Proceedings' of the council, printed in the city's official paper, we rescue this paragraph: 'Request of police commission, that an ordinance be enacted making it a misdemeanor to loiter, loaf or sleep in the official bed of the Los Angeles River; to legislation committee.' We rejoice in the vigilance of the police commission. The bed of the Los Angeles River is not to be slept in. On that sacred bed none may loaf or loiter. It is to be preserved inviolate. A corps of matrons will be appointed to make it regularly. The commission has but done its duty, yet what a reflection its action casts on the character of the homeless wanderers who look covetously on that river bed. We do not hear that the police commission of New York, for instance, asks that sleeping in the bed of the East River or the Hudson be declared a misdemeanor. St. Louis has no trouble in keeping vagrants out of the bed of the Mississippi. Whereas here only constant watchfulness maintains the Los Angeles River bed free from occupants. If a little water could be turned into the river, invaders might be discouraged."

Our Obsolete Fighting Ships

When the cruiser Detroit, which cost the government $1,233,039, was sold a few days ago for $20,000, the fact that a war vessel only twenty years old could in that short time deterioriate to so insignificant a value, recalled to the mind of every naval man in America that the United States Navy, like the English and French, and to a certain extent the German, is at the present time burdened with a great many vessels that are so completely out of date as to be termed "obsolete." For several years now Great Britain has been selling warships that a score of years ago were rated among the greatest afloat, to junk dealers, and the elimination of the Detroit shows that this government is on the eve of adopting a similar policy. The process that leads to the listing "obsolete" and the junk pile, may be said to begin when a war vessel goes "into reserve." The next step is when she is placed "out of commission" in a navy yard, and then come the dismantling and finally the sale to the highest bidder. In the United States Navy it is estimated that at the present time vessels that cost between $140,000,000 and $150,000,000 are either in reserve, dismantled in navy yards, or admittedly of no further fighting value.

Reno Is Glad of the Change

When gambling was suppressed in Nevada the most pessimistic prophecies were made concerning the bad effect which the reform would have on business. In Reno particularly merchants and saloonmen declared that the future of their city was dark indeed. Now it is found that the situation was misunderstood. Prosperity has increased remarkably in the short time since the tiger was hunted to cover. The merchants are surprised and gratified to find that the workingmen have a great deal more money to spend in legitimate ways than they had before. Business which used to be conducted on credit because buyers were temporarily embarrassed by a run of bad luck at the gaming tables, is now being done on a cash basis. There is something of a slump in the sale of expensive lingerie and silk stockings because the gamblers and their women have departed for other fields of endeavor, but of more important articles larger purchases are being made than ever. The strangest circumstance of all is that the saloonmen, with a few exceptions, express themselves as glad that gambling has ceased. Instead of spending all their time at the roulette wheels or the faro banks, men now have time for a sociable glass. And to add to the general prosperity of Reno the divorce colony continues to increase.

The Prospector Still at Work

The early days of gold in California were recalled vividly to the minds of Fresnoites a few days ago when a man offered to pay for tobacco with either gold dust or nuggets. An investigation into the queer offer revealed the fact that the man actually had a quantity of gold dust and nuggets in a "buck skin" bag contained in his pocket. For the benefit of the incredulous, he emptied out a portion of his golden property for inspection. The bag contained about $250 in dust and grains of gold, the largest of the latter being about the size of a pea. When pressed for an explanation the prospector stated that the gold in his possession was the result of about two months' work in the creeks of Tuolumne and Mariposa County, where he has been engaged in placer mining all by himself for the length of time mentioned. A small "burro" was his sole companion, and he gave up his work only when his "grub stake" had been entirely consumed. "Any man can take a pan and make living wages there," explained the prospector, "and there is no reason why any able-bodied person should be loafing about the towns when there is gold to be had such a short distance away and when it can be secured so easily." The picturesque old prospector is evidently not yet a personage of ancient California history.

Victory

By R. B. Cunningham Graham

Ranks upon ranks of rastaquoeres, Brazilians, Roumanians, Russians, Bulgarians, with battalions of Americans, all seated round the "piazza" of the Grand Hotel. Ladies from Boston, Chicago, and New York, their heels too high, their petticoats too much belaced, their Empire combs bediamonded so as to look almost like cut-glass chandeliers, as in their chairs they sat and read the latest news from Tampa, Santiago, and how Cervera's Squadron met the fate which they (the ladies) reckoned God prepares for those who dare to fight against superior odds.

Outside upon the boulevards, cocottes, guides, cabmen, and androgynous young men, touts, and all those who hang about that caravansary where the dulcet Suffolk whine, made sharper by the air of Massachusetts, sounds, passed and repassed.

Smug-faced, black-coated citizens from Buffalo and Albany, and from places like Detroit and Council Bluffs, to which the breath of fashion has not penetrated, scanned the New York Herald, read the glorious news, and, taking off their hats, deigned publicly to recognize the existence of a God, and after standing reverently silent, masticating their green cigars in contemplation of His wondrous ways, to take a drink.

Aquatic plants and ferns known only to hotels, and constituting a sub-family of plants, which by the survival of the ugliest have come at last to stand gas, dust, saliva, and an air befogged with Chypre, grew in the fountain where, in the tepid water, gold fish with swollen eyes, and blotched with patches of unhealthy white, swam to and fro, picking up crumbs and rising to the surface when some one threw a smoked-out cigarette into the basis, in the midst of which a fig-leaved Naiad held a stucco shell.

The corridors were blocked with Saratoga trunks; perspiring porters staggered to and fro, bending beneath the weight of burdens compared to which a sailor's chest is as a pill-box.

All went well; the tapes clicked off their international lies, detailing all the last quotations of the deep mines upon the Rand, the fall in Spanish Fours; in fact, brought home to those with eyes to see, the way in which the Stock Exchange had put a rascals' ring around the globe.

Waiters ran to and fro, their ears attuned to every outrage upon French, seeking to find the meaning of the jargons in which they were addressed.

Majestic butlers in black knee-breeches, and girt about the neck with great brass chains, moved slowly up and down, so grave and so respectable that had you laid your hands upon any one of them and made a bishop of him he would have graced the post.

Mysterious, well-dressed men sat down beside you, and after a few words proposed to take you in the evening to show you something new.

Women walked to and fro, glaring at one another as they had all been tigresses, or again, catching each other's eyes, reddened, and looked ashamed, as if aware, though strangers, that they understood the workings of the other's heart.

Burano chandeliers and modern tapestry, with red brocade on the two well-upholstered chairs, imparted beauty and a look of wealth, making one feel as if by striking an electric bell a door would open and a troop of half dressed women file into the court, after the fashion of another kind of inn.

Outside the courtyard Paris roared, chattered, and yelped, cycles and automobiles made the poor pieton's life a misery, and set one thinking how inferior after all the Mind which thought out Eden was to our own.

Upon the asphalt the horizontales lounged along, pushing against the likely-looking passer-by like cats against a chair.

Cabs rattled, and the whole clinquant town wore its best air of unreality, which it puts off alone upon the morning of a revolution.

Through boulevards, parvis, cites, along the quays, in the vast open spaces which, like Saharas of grey stone, make the town desolate, in cafes, brothels, theatres, in church and studio, and wherever men most congregate, groups stood about reading the news, gesticulating, weeping, perspiring, and agog with a half-impotent enthusiastic orgasm of wildest admiration for Spain, Cervera, and the men who without bunkum or illusion steamed to certain death. And, curiously enough, the execration fell not so much upon Chicago as on "ces cochons d'Anglais," who by their base connivance had wrought the ruin of the Spanish cause.

Yankees themselves read and remarked with sneers that England's turn was coming next, and after "Kewby," that they reckoned to drag the British flag through every dunghill in New York; then one winked furtively and said, "We need them now, but afterwards we'll show Victoria in a cage for a picayune a peep, and teach the Britishers what to do with their old Union Jack," thinking no doubt of the ten-cent paper which is sold in every city of the States, stamped with the Spanish flag.

And as I sat, musing on things and others—thinking, for instance, that when you scratch a man and see his blood you know his nature by the way he bears his wound, and that the Spaniards, wounded to the death, were dying game (after the fashion of the English in times gone by, before Imperialism, before the Nonconformist snuffle, the sweating system, and the rest had changed our nature), and that the Yankees at the first touch cried out like curs, though they had money, numbers, and everything upon their side—I fell a-thinking on the Spain of old. Inigo Lopez de Mendoza, el Gran Captain, Cortes (not at the siege of Mexico, but in the rout before Algiers) came up before me, and I thought on the long warfare, extending over seven hundred years, by which Spain saved the southern half of Europe from the Moors; upon Gerona, Zaragoza, and, most of all, upon Cervera, last of the Quixotes, Vara de Rey, Linares, and the poor peasants from Galician hills, thyme-scented wastes in Lower Aragon, Asturian mountains, and Estremenian oak-woods, who, battling against superior numbers, short of food, of ammunition, and bereft of hope, were proving their descent from the grim soldiers of the Spanish "Tercios" of the Middle Ages, and making the invaders of their country pay for their piracy in blood.

Blood is the conqueror's coin the whole world over, and if the island which Columbus found for Spain pass into other hands, let those who take it pour out their blood like water to inaugurate their reign of peace.

Where the connection between the senses and the brain comes in, which influences first, and how, or whether a wise Providence, always upon His guard (after the fashion of an operator in a Punch and Judy show), influences each man directly, as by celestial thought suggestion, I cannot tell.

All that I know is, that once walking on the rampart gardens which in Cadiz overhang the sea and form the outside rim of the "Taza de Plata," as the Spaniards call the town, I on a sudden saw the River Plate. The Gauchos, plains, wild horses, the stony wastes, the ostriches (the "Alegria del Desierto"), came up before me, and in especial a certain pass over a little river called the Gualiyan; the sandy dip, the metallic-looking trees, the greenish river with the flamingoes and white herons and the black-headed swans; the vultures sitting motionless on the dead trees, and most of all the penetrating scent of the mimosa, known to the natives as the "espinillo de olor."

Turning and wondering why, I saw a stunted tree with yellow blossoms duly ticketed with its description "Mimosa" this or that, and with its "habitat" the warmer district of the River Plate.

I leave these things to wise philosophers and to those men of science who seem to think mankind is worth the martyrdom of living dogs and cats; or who, maybe, drag out the entrails of their quivering fellow-mortals merely to stimulate their senses or erotic powers.

But the "dwawm" over, looking about, fenced in by swarms of overjoyed Americans, all talking shrilly, reading out the news, exultant at the triumph of their fleet, puffed up and arrogant as only the descendants of the Puritans can be, I saw a Spaniard sitting with his daughter, a girl about nineteen.

Himself a Castellano rancio, silent and grave, dressed all in black, moustache waxed to a point, square little feet like boxes, brown little hands, face like mahogany, hair cropped close, and with the unillusional fatalistic air of worldly wisdom mixed with simplicity which characterizes Spaniards of the older school.

Being a Christian, he spoke no tongue but that which Christians use, was proud of it, proud of his ignorance, proud (I have no doubt) of his descent.

No doubt he saw everything through the clear dazzling atmosphere of old Castille, which Spaniards of his kind seem to condense and carry off with them for use in other climes.

Seeing so clearly, he saw nothing clear, for the intelligence of man is so contrived as to be ineffective if a mist of some sort is not interposed.

The daughter fair, fair with the fairness of a Southern, blue-eyed, and skin like biscuit china, hands and feet fine, head well set on, and yet with the decided gestures and incisive speech, the "aire recio," and the "meneo" of the hips in walking, of the women of her race.

They sat some time before a pile of newspapers, the father smoking gravely, taking down the smoke as he were drinking it, and then in a few minutes breathing it out to serve as an embellishment to what he said, holding his cigarette meanwhile fixed in a little silver instrument contrived like two clasped hands.

The Spanish newspapers were, of course, all without news, or said they had none, and as the daughter read, the old man punctuated with "Valiente," "Pobrecitas," and the like, when he heard how before El Caney, Vara de Rey had died, or how the Americans had shot the three Sisters of the Poor whose bodies were found lying with lint and medicine in their hands.

"Read me the papers of the Americans, hija de mi corazon," and she began, translating as she read.

Perspective Impressions

Police scandals we have always with us, the reason being that we always have police.

There's a very distinguished person at Sacramento who seems to be jagged with authority.

San Francisco will now proceed to have growing pains. Watch us embrace the other side of the bay.

Marsdon Manson says that Spring Valley is worth $37,000,000. The bear transformed into a bull.

The Chronicle complains that while a movement has been started in London to erect a suitable monument to Bret Harte there is no monument to him in San Francisco. Quite true, but San Francisco has a monument to Robert Louis Stevenson, and no movement has yet been started to erect one to him in London.

Senator Reed of Kansas having drafted a bill to prohibit bands on cigars because bands ruin many of them the New York Sun observes how remarkable it is that the green cheese in the moon has not appeared worthy of remedial legislation in Kansas. The California Legislature has exclusive jurisdiction in lunacy matters.

Elbert Hubbard is a true Philistine. He says that grammar is as useless as the vermiform appendix. And yet it is clear that Mr. Hubbard wasted some time trying to master the rudiments of that science before learning that knowledge is

"—— but a kind
Of wantonness and luxury of the mind."

He reminds us that

"Men's talents grow more bold and confident,
The further they're beyond their just extent,
As smatterers prove more arrogant and pert,
The less they truly understand an art;
And, when they've least capacity to doubt,
Are wont t' appear most perempt'ry and stout."

The Spectator

Our Director-General

Now that we are to have a world's fair it follows as the night the day that we are also to have a director-general. Upon whose shoulders is the enormous responsibility of this great office to fall? If it be a sin to covet this bright honor what a lot of transgressors there are among our leading cits? Well, may the best man win. I have no choice for the job. But earnestly do I hope that the winner will stack up to his responsibilities, fall not below the measure of his duties. It is a mighty big job, this director-generalship. Not one man in ten thousand has the capacity for administration which will be required of a director-general. None but a man of varied talents and rare experience will suffice. Above all things he ought to have great executive ability such as has been acquired in the management of diverse enterprises. He ought to be a man whose intellectuals have received high cultivation, who has traveled, whose horizon is broad, whose enthusiasm is unbounded. Obviously it is no easy to task to find the man to fill the bill. And one might imagine that not many men of average intelligence could be found eager to assume the responsibilities of the office. But the woods are full of them; of men so obviously unfit that it is a joke to mention their names. And I hear that some of them have considerable backing, and that consequently it will be no easy matter to make a judicious selection.

The Spurs of Ambition

The Director-General of the World's Fair will be a man of great power and great prestige. He will have considerable patronage at his disposal, he will have some very precious favors to dispense, his influence will be such that he will rank in importance above every individual in the State. So the job is really worth having for the man who is able to do himself justice in the chair of authority. But if a man take the chair and fall short of the requirements he will have much reason to regret that he had not flung away his vaulting ambition. Woe to the small man who has merely succeeded in little things and flatters himself that he was born to be sublimely great!

The Great Fight

During the progress of the fight for the World's Fair it was amusing to observe how the dailies differed with reference to the distribution of glory among the men on the firing line. Each paper had its pets and boosted them accordingly. The only man who received credit from all was R. B. Hale whose dry-goods advertisements are printed in all the dailies, and who was therefore not to be deprived of his meed of praise. There is no sympathy so perfect as that which exists between the business office and the editorial sanctum. Of course Mr. Hale is deserving of credit, and so are all the gentlemen who devoted their energies to the city's interests. And now that we have won a great triumph we should not be niggard of our praises. And I hope that I will not be suspected of a disposition to disparage any of our gallant heroes when I observe that at first we relied too much on men who know more about merchandise than they know about politics. It was not their fault that while we were felicitating ourselves on the superior merit of our arguments the New Orleans politicians who know the ropes were pledging congressmen from one end of the country to the other. When our politicians went on, such men as Theodore Bell, M. F. Tarpey, Frank Herring, Mayor McCarthy and Thornwell Mullally and joined forces with M. H. De Young who has had experience as a lobbyist, and Andrew M. Lawrence, also a man of experience, the complexion of the situation began to change. These men rendered real assistance to our Congressmen. It was in the very last week of the fight that the effective political tricks were turned. Of this fact everybody is probably aware who followed the course of events. So it must have been amusing to the people who read the Bulletin last Tuesday and learned from its columns that the people of San Francisco are indebted only to Fremont Older, Rudolph Spreckels and Francis J. Heney. They lined up the insurgents, we are told. The men that made the fight for us on the floor of the House are Congressmen J. Sloat Fassett, Sereno Payne, Sulzer and Tawney. They are not insurgents.

The Parochial Press

The parochialism of our daily press was strikingly illustrated during the progress of the Fair fight by the studied and zealous efforts of the Chronicle's contemporaries to keep M. H. De Young out of the limelight. Mr. De Young was one of the most active of Fair boosters. He has been hammering away from the beginning with characteristic persistency, with the same energy with which he overcame opposition in this city to the Midwinter Fair and made of that memorable event a most creditable achievement. Two of the pinheaded dailies have never mentioned his name. In sharp contract to the littleness of their spirit was the action of the Chronicle in publishing a picture of William R. Hearst on Wednes-

He Would Give Us Coney Island

Frederic Thompson, one of the greatest showmen in America, was in this city not long ago. Thompson created Luna Park at Coney Island and is the successful producer of many plays, including "Polly of the Circus" in which his wife Mabel Taliaferro starred. While he was in this city he met his old friend Dick Ferris of Los Angeles and their conversation turned on the Panama Exposition. "Dick," said Thompson, "if San Francisco gets the fair I'll put Luna Park on wheels and move it out here." Ferris remembered the joking statement on Monday night and sent a wire to Thompson: "Get ready to move Luna Park." Now here is a suggestion for the men who are in charge of the exposition. If they want to make the amusement concessions a great financial success, let them induce Frederic Thompson to take charge of them. He is a showman who knows the show business from the ground up. They swear by him in New York. He could lay out a "Midway" that would be the talk of the world. Why not start right by inviting Frederic Thompson to make some sort of a proposition? It won't do any harm to see what he thinks about the project.

Our Mayor Is Rich

It is the most natural thing in the world for us to take an interest in the private affairs of our great men. Our curiosity is always alert to pierce the secrets of their personality, to delve into their domestic life, to glimpse their unguarded moments of relaxation. Naturally this interest extends to Mr. P. H. McCarthy, our chief executive. He is one of the great men of our parish and we want to know all about him. I have just gleaned an interesting fact concerning Mayor McCarthy from an unexpected source. Mr. Frederic Palmer, the war correspondent, contributed to the February issue of Hampton's an article entitled "San Francisco of the Closed Shop," which is far from complimentary to Mayor McCarthy. One statement in it I have never seen before. It is a statement from the lips of Mayor McCarthy himself which makes him a rich man. Mr. Palmer quotes the mayor as saying: "The present speaker is telling you that he values his union card more than the honor of the mayor's office or all the money he has made—and P. H. McCarthy made money, sixty thousand dollars in stocks in the nineties."

Who Is This Man?

Young Richard Barry, the former San Francisco newspaperman who was recently embroiled with the suffragists of New York, has just contributed to one of the magazines an article with the lurid title, "Who Betrays the Working Girl?" With Barry's answer to the query I am not at all concerned, but I am rather interested in one story which he tells in the course of his article. I may as well quote it here: "There was once in San Francisco a merchant-prince who also gave a museum to the city. He was not in his personal life as was Marshall Field, abstemious, self-denying, absorbed in the mental problems of his vast affairs. Instead, he had the emotional nature of a Turk, the conscience of a Persian satrap, and the sexual instinct of Louis XVI. This merchant was a bachelor, but he had eleven 'homes' scattered judiciously in exclusive localities. These 'homes' were peopled by concubines which he acquired from various sources, but the principal source was his own store. There he kept a man on the constant lookout for young, attractive girls, and like Louis XVI, he wanted them 'quite fresh.' In this store a girl received from three to seven dollars a week, according to the length of her service. When the week's work was done she could go on Sunday afternoon to Golden Gate Park and there be permitted, under the suspicious eye of uniformed guards, to look for a brief time on the treasures amassed from scrimping her wages and the wages of the 'likes of her,' or she might be 'fortunate' enough to be invited to one of the eleven 'homes.' Then she could have a few treasures of art and dress every day in the week. But for her own normal, wholesome life, she had less than enough to supply the bare necessities." Now, I would like to know who that man was. What has become of his museum in Golden Gate Park? What has become of the department store? Richard Barry has been drawing heavily on his imagination. His story is even more faulty than his grammar and his historical allusions, which are certainly bad enough, in all conscience.

The Professor Scolds

Professor Henry Morse Stephens addressed the Merchants' Association some time ago on the proposal to consolidate the bay cities in a "Greater San Francisco." The professor is in favor of the proposition. But that is neither here nor there. The interesting thing is that he took occasion to scold the city a little. He did it in these words: "Do you realize that wherever there is an intelligent person in the world there is a knowledge of San Francisco? It sometimes seems to me strange that one like myself, who has come from a foreign land, should have to bring home to you the real romance of this wonderful city. You do not seem to know it; you do not seem to know—if you will pardon me for saying it—your own history." And one of the merchants present was mean enough to say that San Francisco might know more about its own history if only the professor would finish his "History of the Fire."

A "Modern" Comedy by Gayley

I have been told on the quiet that there is a secret over on the University campus that is coming to be Polichinelle's. By way of a little intellectual treat—a sort of mental cocktail to whet the appetite of his most intimate admirers—I understand that Professor Charles Mills Gayley has been spreading the news—sub rosa, of course—that he is writing a modern comedy. A "modern" comedy by the author of "Classic Myths" and the "Plays of Our Forefathers" and more lately of the phosphorescent "Idols of Education" is sure to be interesting. Gayley is one of the chief antagonists of the co-educational system and is sometimes wont to lecture for an hour or so on Ibsen, who, he says, is not worth wasting one's time over. He has also been known to take an occasional fling at women's clubs. These convictions, together with his interesting and original views on the suffragette question, the high cost of living, the principles and progress of poetry, the education of children and the fundamental basis of esthetics, will certainly make for something worth while in the elevation of the stage, a task which seems either to be sadly neglected or forgotten just at present. Professor Gayley, who has lately been making a detailed study of old English comedy, believes, according to those who have been fortunate enough to be entrusted with this momentous secret, that the stage ought to be enriched with a few high comedies of the type Percy Mackaye is producing. The professor's comedy has already been in an embryonic stage for more than a year. The manuscript, however, will soon be sent to the literary director of the New Theater, according to campus rumors.

The Omnipotent One

The Hon. Hiram Johnson is now enjoying that very same blissful immunity which was for a time the glad prerogative of another distinguished personage. Also, like that same distinguished personage, he is waxing fat on the tributes of deference which cowardly sycophants in office pay to the autocrat of the hour. What he says, goes.

His nod compels obeisance. His frown causes gooseflesh. His ipse dixit increases the membership of the Ananias Club. The members of the Legislature are falling over their own feet in their haste to lick his boots. They are pointing with pride to their servility. They are shouting their sycophancy from the housetops. Now may the rogue vindicate his claim to sainthood by making sacrifice of the last vestiges of his manhood on the reeking altar of patronage. It is all very disgusting, but the popular stomach is for the present in no danger of revolting. The unheaded multitude is capricious, but not easily disenchanted. After the apotheosis there is always a pause. The dazzled worshipers require some little time in which to recover their sight—and invariably it returns.

The Mob and the Hypocrite

Speaking of Governor Johnson, Mr. Alden Anderson says that he hates a hypocrite. So do the people, but it is hard for them to see through a mask. Besides the people do not always know as much about a man as it known by individuals who have private sources of information. And to the credit of the people, be it said they do not always believe what they hear about a man—especially if he seems to be their man. Indeed, they are disposed to palliate the weaknesses of their man. Even hypocrisy they will tolerate while the hypocrite is gratifying their passions. So far as the people are concerned it really does not matter if Governor Johnson, as Mr. Anderson intimates, once upon a time had a hand out for crumbs from the Southern Pacific table, and went away disappointed. Even though it should appear that Governor Johnson's hostility to the corporation is inspired with a revengeful motive, the people will sympathize with him so long as they believe he is going to advantage them. The people love to be told they are scrupulous and honest; and they are when they have no selfish interests to subserve. There are times when they are quite willing to be led into dishonesty, and it is only when they have found that it hasn't paid that they experience a change of emotion. And then they salve their conscience by kicking their erstwhile leader into oblivion.

"The Soul's Rubaiyat"

It is worth while noting that not all of a club woman's activities are of a futile description. That sentiment may sound ungracious and undoubtedly it is not entirely polite. But as a mere man one may be pardoned for holding to the conviction that the debate in the California Club on the subject, "Are man's dominant qualities being transferred to woman?" bears all the earmarks of futility and can serve no useful purpose. And, therefore, when we find one of the debaters engaged in really serious work, it is permissible to flash a spark of masculine optimism on the subject of women's clubs. The debater to whom I refer is Mrs. Anna Woodward Truesdell and her serious work is a pretty little volume recently issued from the publishing house of A. M. Robertson, entitled, "The Soul's Rubaiyat." This is quite an ambitious poem clothed in the Fitzgerald quatrains which we have come to associate with the work of the old Persian hedonist. It was not the most appropriate metre for Mrs. Truesdell's purpose, but she has handled it with all the success that was possible, considering the difficulty of her subject. For "The Soul's Rubaiyat" deals with a very difficult theme. It is the age-old theme of the individual's relation to the universe. When inherited belief is unsettled the groping after new truth often results in substituting rationalism for dogmatic religion. That is the tragedy of many souls; it is the theme of Mrs Truesdell's poem .

Taking Omar Seriously

Mrs. Truesdell evidently takes the ancient Persian seriously. She does not find in his verses, as I do, the elaboration of Rabelais' "Oracle of the Bottle." She thinks him a religious teacher, the expounder of what has been called "an idealized sufism," which only means that he uses the language of a voluptuary in a symbolical religious sense. Having respect for Omar's study of the "great ruler's scheme to man," Mrs. Truesdell wonders "if aught more today we know; aught more, life's puzzle-riddle solve than he." She finds that despite his teaching of a thousand years ago "sleek tradition" is still "deifying fetish, faith and fate" (which is a strange collocation of terms) and keeping the "deadly keys where souls are locked in darkness, fed on lees of legends steeped in dreams, dank cloister weeds." Then she exclaims, "A score of centuries since Jesus died, and sin our daily comrade still?" She wonders if the Saviour's life was lived in vain and "the serpent Doubt" asks, "With the Almighty would you make a trade? So much salvation for so much shed blood?" The soul revolts at the idea. It asks, What is sin? Is God's mercy greater than man's and man's religion? And so "from Ark of the old faith" the soul goes forth, seeking truth. It tries philosophy and finds it a "maelstrom of words"; it investigates the ancient religions and receives no help. For truth it searches "a hundred seas and lands," but truth eludes. Nature is questioned and replies that "the individual is a worthless weed," preaching the survival of the fittest and crying, "Away with shrine and kirk." Although truth is not found, there ensues a struggle between truth and doubt and the soul prays God for mercy in a sort of despair, And finally comes the query, "Omar! Ah, do you yet the Mystery know? Is Death a Fakir with no wonder-show?"

The Creed of Love

In the second half of the poem Mrs. Truesdell shows the soul disentangling itself from the maze of doubt. She resolves to put away the old faith that has ceased to satisfy and to accept truth wherever she finds it. It is a period of agony. "Oh! The hurt when old beliefs are rent from lives by churchyard doorways long content." Truth comes bearing two tablets, History and Science, and promises that the time will come when these two will be reconciled, thus showing God's purpose to man. But this is unsatisfactory. The soul is interested in the salvation, not of the race, but of the individual. And then finally Truth reveals the secret. It is Love. "A heart of love the key that opens now the one life-truth to thee." And so "the little gods of fretting creed" are cast out and Love remains. I have summarized this poem at some length because it is much more ambitious than the usual effort of our local versifiers. Mrs. Truesdell has thought seriously and has been at considerable pains to express her thoughts and her conclusions. She deserves to be appreciated. Whether her poem will bring consolation to souls in distress is quite another question. Probably it depends on the souls. It is not profound; it does not sound any unaccustomed deeps or rise to any unusual heights. And it is not au courant with the religious trend of the times. The movement away from dogma, in the opinion of many careful observers, has exhausted itself. The pendulum is swinging the other way. But Mrs. Truesdell, as a club woman who has done a thing of importance, is worthy of praise.

The Return of a San Francisco Girl

I notice that Geraldine Malone is coming to this city with James T. Powers in "Havana." Geraldine Malone is a San Francisco girl who left here several years ago to win histrionic fame in the East. She has evidently achieved considerable success, although she did not start out to be a musical comedy actress. Like her father she was ambitious to shine in the legitimate and left Notre Dame College in this city before graduating to take lessons in histrionics. Her father was John T. Malone who was very well known here a generation ago. He was a Santa Clara college man who came up from San Jose and achieved a great deal of local fame as a Shakespearian actor. He was a great student of Shakespeare and went to London where he worked hard to perfect himself in the great roles. When he returned to San Francisco it was in the distinguished company of Booth and Barrett and he could not stand the comparison. His old friends realized that he was not a great Shakespearian actor, but he commanded great respect on account of his scholarly attainments and his high theatrical ideals. Malone finally realized that he was not destined to win high rank as a tragedian and went to Harvard where he lectured on the Shakespearian drama.

Dan O'Connell Marked Down

"There is a psychology in book buying," remarked a collector who has had considerable success in his search for rare Californiana. "Part of it consists in attending furniture sales. The people who go to furniture auctions know very little about books and when books are offered, in miscellaneous lots, they go for almost nothing. And yet you are likely to get a prize. Once I got 'Shapes of Clay' and 'Black Beetles in Amber' for ten cents apiece. And only a few days ago I saw 'Songs of Bohemia,' Dan O'Connell's volume of poetry, knocked down for twenty cents." I repeated this conversation to Aleck Robertson, the publisher, and his eyes gleamed. "I published that book," he said, "and I haven't a single copy of it. If I had, I wouldn't part with it for twenty dollars."

Steam Beer Redivivus

After years of neglect it looks as though steam beer is once more coming into its own. Time was when steam was not quaffed exclusively by teamsters and other horny-handed sons of toil. At a date not so far distant, before this city was as much addicted to "airs" as it is now, there was no vulgarity imputed to the man who confessed a liking for steam. That was before the expensive brews of Milwaukee and St. Louis came to compete with our own excellent lagers. But the halcyon days of steam seem to be reappearing. An incident that happened at the Press Club in the wee sma' hours comes to mind. A little coterie was speeding the dark hours with music and reminiscence when somebody "reminisced" about steam beer. That gave one of the party an idea. He proposed that they all shake the dice to determine which two of the crowd should go around the corner to Fourth street and get a few quarts of steam. The proposal was hailed with enthusiasm, the dice were rattled; the two lowest throwers were supplied with a big tin receptacle from the kitchen and carrying it between them, stole out in the twilight like two maids a-dairying, to get a supply of steam. Habits spread in clubdom and although it is something of a cry from the Press Club in Market street to the Pacific-Union on Nob Hill, who knows but that the cushioned millionaires may yet smack their lips, as their fathers did many a time, over a long glass of sharp cool steam. They say it is only three generations from shirt sleeves to shirt sleeves. Let us see how many decades it is from steam to steam.

Elvia Crox Is Dead

Quite by chance I learned the other day of the death in New York of Elvia Crox, formerly a great favorite at the Tivoli. She was at one time the wife of Thomas Seabrooke, the comedian. Elvia Crox was a versatile woman, equally at home in drama and opera. I recall that she shone locally both as Nedda in "I Pagliacci" and as Roxane in "Cyrano de Bergerac." She had many friends here and will be sincerely mourned.

The Creed of a Poet's Daughter

Eccentricity seems to be hereditary in the family of Joaquin Miller. The seer of The Hights cannot be conventional. There is no record, of course, that he ever tried; but if he should, there is no doubt that his efforts would be most unconventionallly unsuccessful. His daughter Juanita has inherited the trait. Quite recently a New York paper discovered her ensconced in a little box-like studio in Carnegie Hall and living on $17 a week. She is studying song writing and giving lessons. If the poetical faculty is also hereditary, Miss Miller may achieve her ambition. Meanwhile she is proving herself an eccentric. She has some very peculiar ideas. Listen to her:

"I believe in predestination and transmigration, and know that I started on my circle at a white point to which I shall return. Every emotion and every crime is a color; but, whatever may be the somberness of the color tone, everything shall be white again at last. The other day an old man came to see me under the name of Duncan. He told me that he could not give me his right name, for he had been a convict. He believed that blue was the color from which we start and in which we end. We had the most interesting discussion. Proposals of marriage have come from California, Texas, Canada and from all of the big cities of the land, but I am not yet at the point where I should marry; and may be I shall not marry until my next existence on earth. I can take none of the proposals seriously, for I must wait until my time comes."

Clever Valentines

The merry sentimental observance of St. Valentine's day has each year grown more general and the "grown ups" as well as the children have come to consider this as another occasion for the sending of friendly greetings or messages of love. Yearly Paul Elder and Company, 239 Grant avenue, have prepared a variety of original missives—humorous, sentimental and beautiful to meet each individual need. Their valentines this year are more attractive than ever before.

The Ladies Played High

If by chance you had wandered into the white and gold room of the St. Francis on Tuesday evening, you would have rubbed your eyes in surprise and wondered whether you had been suddenly transported to the great casino at Monte Carlo. For the white and gold room was tenanted by half a hundred men and women, the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Leopold Michels, who were indulging in an unusual form of social diversion. They were having the time of their lives staking their gold against the caprices of the moody Goddess of Chance. It was a very interesting scene. The half-hundred guests were all personages of considerable prominence in the community. Some of the most beautiful women in town were there and they were exquisitely dressed according to the most recent ukase of fashion. The center of attraction was a roulette wheel of the most approved French design. The clatter of the little ivory ball proved an irresistible lure to both men and women and the cloth was agleam with golden stakes. The women particularly showed a disposition to play high; in fact some of their bets were of almost startling size. As the night wore on the ladies simply monopolized the wheel, so eager were they to dally with its fascinating hazard. The men could not get near it; it was literally surrounded by a circle of gleaming shoulders. Of course there were other games, and the men were forced to satisfy their gambling enthusiasm in poker, etc., leaving the roulette wheel to their better halves. When the entertainment came to an end a great deal of pin money had been lost and won. I say "pin money," for pin money in our smart set runs into impressive figures. Mr. and Mrs. Michels were congratulated on having devised a splendid form of entertainment. As one lady remarked, "It was the best fun I have had since our last visit to the Riviera."

She Is Still a Spinster

An amusing interchange took place at one of the big card parties this week. A lady who has been abroad for several years and had but recently returned thought she recognized in her vis-a-vis a prominent young society lady of former years. Said the traveler: "Were you not formerly Miss Soandso?" To which the other coolly replied: "Yes, and I am still holding down my maiden name."

Ballet Dancing in Society

Would you be surprised if, in the next Kirmess, some of the clever girls in society appeared in public in the scanty costume which Pavlowa wore at the Valencia? Well, that is just what may happen. No doubt it will be a great shock to the staider folk in society to see the pretty misses exposing their charms in the costumes of a ballet, but we—most of us—are not as prim as we used to be and the innovation will be sure to cause a great deal of excitement. Ballet dancing is the latest fad in society and it is not confined to the debutantes by any means; even some of the matrons meet once a week to take lessons There is a class every Wednesday at Miss Hamlin's and the attendance is quite large. Among the young women who are learning the art in which Pavlowa and Genee excel are Mrs. Ray Somers and the Misses Agnes Tillmann, Helen Leavitt, Marie Louise Foster, Elva de Pue, Mina Van Bergen and Dorothy Van Sicklen. Miss Van Sicklen is one of the most proficient.

The Dance of the Forty Dominoes

The dance on last Wednesday evening at the Town and Gown Club in Berkeley was the jolliest affair given this season by the exclusive young folk in the college town. The evening afforded one surprise which I have not seen mentioned. The girls stole a march on the young men, very much to the bewilderment of the latter. As usual, the forty girls were escorted to the hall by the college men, who left them at the door of the dressing room. When the girls reappeared they were transformed. Over their pretty frocks they wore white kimono dominoes covered with large black polka dots. They hid their faces behind black masks and their hair in white hoods. The young men were taken by surprise as the girls filed into the ballroom and had a great to-do finding their partners. Owing to mistakes in identity two or three interesting little heart secrets were let slip before the girls unmasked. Needless to say the merriment was great. The dance was voted the pleasantest ever.

To Save Their Velvets

This has been a season of velvets, as many a husband has found to his cost, for velvet gowns are dreadfully expensive and do not last long, as they are susceptible to every imprint and soon acquire a shabby appearance. A certain hostess at a swagger card party had this in mind, and to the great astonishment of her guests came into the card room with an armful of newspapers, remarking: "If any of you ladies are afraid to spoil your velvet gowns by sitting on these rattan chairs, here are some newspapers to put under you." The guests did not avail themselves of the offer, which shows that they scorn economy. But I am willing to bet that their husbands would bless that hostess for her thoughtfulness.

The Men Stayed Away

Without making any pretensions of arithmetical accuracy, I should say that the women outnumbered the men at the Pacific-Union opening about ten to one. Never in the history of the city were men so shy about entering their own club. They stayed home or down town and let their wives

It was nothing like the opening of the Bohemian Club when the ladies were allowed the privilege of signing wine cards and had such a hilarious time that they had to be reminded at midnight—some of them—that is was about time to think of going home. Polo Fields for Aviation

Clarence Walker, son of the late David Walker, formerly president of the California Safe Deposit Company, has been trying to secure Charley Clark's polo field down in San Mateo in order to aviate privately, I hear. Walker recently bought a thirty-horsepower biplane from Glenn Curtiss and made several quite successful flights on one of the dull days of the recent meet. He wanted to get far from the madding crowd, however, and Clark's polo field down on the county road seemed an ideal place to become an expert in the newest art. However, the Clarks are away in Europe now, and the caretaker was rather afraid of displeasing the senator's son by converting the field into an impromptu aviation field. Last Saturday Walker decided to fly from Selfridge field down to the San Mateo polo field to show some of his friends his new biplane, but landed in a gully. He is going to Salt Lake City to fly in the near future. The Clarks, by the way, are making an extended trip on the Continent and will not be back until late in the summer. Had they been home, there is not a doubt that Clarence Walker would have gained consent to use the field. From the interest the Hillsboro and San Mateo people are showing in aviation, it will not be long before the polo fields will be filled with biplanes and monoplanes.

The Death of Mrs. Heney

The death of Mrs. Francis J. Heney has thrown several prominent families into mourning. As Rebecca McMullin, Mrs. Heney was a great social favorite. The elder folks will readily recall the hospitable home of Mrs. John McMullin in California street near Hyde. Mrs. McMullin was the first society matron in the city to have a private ballroom in her home. The house was afterward sold to Dr. Younger. When he went to Paris with his family it was rented to Mrs. William Hood. It was destroyed in the fire. Pretty Susie McMullin married Thomas H. Williams. After their divorce she married a prominent Kentuckian and died in the South. Anna McMullin became Mrs. Jack Hayes, Lilo McMullin became Mrs. E. B. Perrin, and Betty McMullin Mrs. Charles Weller. They were all favorite belles in their debutante days. Owing to the death of their aunt, Miss Eliza McMullin and Miss Anna Weller will be greatly missed in society for the remainder of the season.

The Best Passport to Society

Mrs. Herbert Asquith, the "woman with the serpent's tongue," made something of a sensation in London recently by a statement on the witness stand. She was called as a witness in the suit for slander brought by Mrs. Horace West against her father-in-law, Sir Algernon West. The premier's wife was asked whether the fact that the plaintiff had been described as extravagant would endanger her social position. To which she replied: "On the contrary, I should think it would be her best passport to society." The reply has been widely quoted and variously commented on. It seems to surprise a lot of people who ought to be better informed. Do we not all know that the woman who has the inclination to force the barriers of society can always accomplish her purpose by the free use of money? Let her entertain extravagantly and unless she belongs to the class set down as "utterly impossible" she will receive recognition. So why should Mrs. Asquith's remark cause so much surprise?

The Soft Pedal

At a recent dinner-party a certain orchestral conductor sat next to a handsome and brilliant woman who is noted not only for saying what she likes, but also for saying it whenever and wherever she may feel disposed so to do. When the champagne had begun to flow rather freely, the lady suddenly remarked to her musical partner: "Organ is played with the feet, isn't it?" "Partly," replied the man of the baton, whose ears turned very red on the instant. "I'm surprised then," continued the relentless one, "that you didn't become an organist rather than an orchestral leader." Everyone looked at the pair and the offender's hearing appendages turned quickly to a deep and unbecoming shade of purple. Thereafter he became noticeably quiet, and it is to be hoped that his well-known propensity for pedal studies was cured for all time to come.

The Philanthropic Tevis

When the news came from New York some time ago of the illness in that city of Dr. Harry Tevis more than one person in this city was filled with grave apprehension. "There is not a man in this city," said a well known banker to me when he heard that Tevis had been stricken with appendicitis, "whose death would cause more genuine sorrow than that of Dr. Harry Tevis." I looked at him in astonishment. I have known Dr. Tevis for years, and I have never regarded him as a very popular man. He has always impressed me as being an odd genius with a little of the artistic temperament, not much given to cultivating friendships but inclined to indulge some quaint, and a few expensive, whims. He is chiefly absorbed in his home, and the one he now has in the Santa Cruz Mountains, I am told, is a wonderful place. Every little while he adds some new feature. He goes in for athletics, and for automobiles and of these he has a very large collection. But to return to my bank friend. Noting my look of astonishment, he said, "I don't know anybody who has as much charity in his heart as Tevis. That man is supporting about a dozen people right now. He is especially kind to the impoverished widows of old-timers. He is educating boys and girls with artistic talent in Europe. Some time ago I happened to tell him of the son of an old-timer for whom I had obtained a job in an architect's office. 'Has he any talent in that direction?' he asked. I told him I didn't know. 'I wish you'd find out,' he said. I did. The architect told me the youngster had a great deal of talent. I told Tevis, and he is now educating the boy in the East."

Who Will Be Mrs. Director-General?

That is the absorbing theme of conversation in society just now. There is a social side to the position of director-general which the men may overlook but to which the women are keenly alive. They are very anxious that the director-general should be someone whose wife has an assured place in society. There will be a deal of entertaining during the exposition season. Distinguished visitors will come here from all over the globe and swarms of envoys of more or less impressive rank will flaunt their uniforms and their orders and decorations for the edification of our provincialism. All these people must be suitably received and society thinks that they should not be turned over to the tender mercies of those who lack the grand manner of the haut ton. Now it happens that several of the men who have been mentioned for director-general have no particular social position; none at least that our exclusives recognize. Hence the uneasiness of the women. Of all our public celebrations the Portola came nearer to measuring up to the high standard demanded by our exacting aristocrats than any other. And yet the Portola was not altogether to their taste. They feel that if the right man is chosen for director-general San Francisco will be able to show the world that it satisfies the social requirements of European capitals. The ladies have picked out from their ranks the personage whom they would like to salute as "Mrs. Director-General." For fear of exciting a tempest in a teapot I withhold her name.

The Cawston Ostrich Farm

Since time immemorial, the ostrich plume has been recognized as a peer of the diamond and the ruby for the adornment of feminine royalty. Cleopatra sent hunters into her native African deserts to gather the matchless wing feathers of the earth's hugest bird; and today the ostrich plume is still a necessity to the wardrobes of the courts of the whole world. So, when visitors pass into the beautiful Cawston Ostrich Farm at South Pasadena and move about among the 150 great ostriches, they are in close touch with the most interesting and valuable bird on earth—the most sought-after bird of all history and a conspicuous tempter of the vanity of women since times older that Rome. Swiftly advancing civilization has altered many human tastes, but it has only increased the feminine instinct for the ostrich plume. Here, at the great original American ostrich farm, which Mr. Cawston has made famous the world over, the modern American woman may see such a display of the royal feather as Cleopatra never saw, nor present-day royalty, either—several thousand dollars' worth of living plumes displayed by the birds themselves, and $50,000 worth of prepared plumes on exhibition in an adjoining building. And, more wonderful still, the whole evolution of the most luxuriant ostrich plumes known—the scientifically produced Cawston plumes—lies open before the eyes of the visitor. "From egg to plume" is no idle catch word at the Cawston Farm. Here every thought is bent toward developing the egg into the highest class of feather product possible. Science and skill are applied to the egg the moment it is laid, and from that instant its value is developed step by step until the quality for which mankind cherishes it—the plume quality—is brought to perfection. There, right before your eyes, is each step in the wonreful process—the huge ivory-colored eggs lying in their sand nests, guarded by pairs of ungainly birds; the newly-hatched, frowsy chicks about the size of a large hen; the feeding of the birds of various ages; the plucking of the plumes in the harvest season, and finally the preparation of the feathers in the factory.

Having seen the eggs, the chicks and the grown birds, the visitor turns to the factory, where the wonderful feather goods, for which the name Cawston is famous the world over, are prepared. This is the largest ostrich feather factory west of New York, and the most famous probably in the world. The Cawston Ostrich Feathers have been awarded prize medals at the expositions in Paris, Buffalo, Omaha, St. Louis, Portland and Jamestown in competition with the world's manufacturers. We now turn to the handsome exhibition salesroom, where the most magnificent display of ostrich plumes is arranged. The stock in this room alone amounts to $50,000. A city salesroom is also maintained at No. 313 South Broadway, Los Angeles. The Cawston Ostrich Farm has no agents. Another large Cawston farm composed of almost 1000 birds is maintained at San Jacinto purely for breeding purposes. Here experiments are carried on in crossing the different strains of ostriches imported by Mr. Cawston. Mr. Cawston originated ostrich farming in America twenty-two years ago, when he imported a flock of fifty birds from Africa. The vicissitudes of the homeward voyage is the specially chartered and equipped ship form a story of intensest interest, but too long to relate here. It is told briefly in a souvenir catalogue issued by the Farm, and which may be had on request. The catalogue also gives details concerning the big feather repair department maintained by the Cawston factory, where old feathers may be sent from any part of the world for rehabilitation. Ostrich feathers never become too old to be made over by experts. The farm pays the shipping charges on all goods repaired or sold. Ostrich plumes last a lifetime, defying changing fashions. Thousands of visitors pour into the Cawston Ostrich Farm annually to study the process whereby this fashion which has held women for centuries is satisfied.

A Crackerjack Orpheum Bill

It is the theory of the Orpheum management that the ideal vaudeville bill is one which contains some numbers that please everybody and some about which there is a difference of opinion. This theory is undoubtedly correct, as might be expected of a theory indulged by men whose experience enables them to speak the last word about variety entertainment. All lovers of vaudeville agree in their liking for a clever sketch, a mirthful monologue and a rapid song and dance turn. Not all lovers of vaudeville like an acrobatic turn; many have no use for an animal act; still others are unenthusiastic about a straightaway vocal number. But as all tastes must be catered to, a bill which contains all these elements is regarded as an ideal bill. In other words the individual judgment of a whole bill is worthless in appraising the excellence of an Orpheum program; it is the collective judgment of the men, women and children who sit upstairs and down which makes a show at the Orpheum good, bad or indifferent. Judging from the enthusiasm of the audience, the bill at the Orpheum this week has been unusually good. Three acts stand out as particularly clever and entertaining, two of them being old friends: "Cherie," a slangy sketch by George V. Hobart; Harry Tate's absurd "Motoring"; and Charles B. Lawlor with his two attractive daughters in a song and dance turn that carries the mind back pleasantly to the olden times before Wigwam variety had yielded to Orpheum vaudeville. The changing fashions have brought "Cherie" back to us in a hobble gown which Marie Stuart manipulates with considerable skill, even when it becomes necessary for her to dance in it. Clayton White extracts as much fun from his lines as before, which is saying a great deal. "Motoring" contains the sort of horseplay which is irresistible, never offensive. The person who cannot laugh at it is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils. The offering of the Lawlor family is full of good character work, Italian, Irish and Bowery. It is one of the exceptional vaudeville acts, the kind that you go to see a second and a third time. John Neff and Carrie Starr have a joshing and singing act that the crowd can't get enough of. Hugh Lloyd has what is called an "original novelty bounding rope act." It is all of that and more. Experienced Orpheum patrons will tell you that it is unique. The Victoria Four, a quartet of young men who are sartorial visions, Arthur Borani and Annie Nevaro in acrobatic twistings and Madame Vallecita, a very comely young woman who puts a cageful of leopards through their paces, complete a crackerjack bill.

"Havana" at the Savoy

The last performance of "The Chocolate Soldier" will be given at the Savoy this Saturday evening and on Sunday night James T. Powers will begin a limited engagement in the Shubert production of "Havana," an entertaining combination of melody, movement and fun in which the music ranks with the most delightful ever sent to this side from England, it being by the composer of "Florodora." Mr. Powers, of course, is the principal comedy element and he is said to shine even more brilliantly than ever before in his long and successful laugh-creating career. The music is written in Leslie Stuart's best vein, the scenery is by Arthur Voetglin of the New York Hippodrome, the costumes by Melville Ellis and the business and dancing numbers by Ned Wayburn. There are three acts and all of the scenes are laid in Havana.

Josef Hofmann, "Master-Pianist"

Ever since he was six years of age Josef Hofmann has been one of the most notable figures in the world of music. He is one of the very few "wonder-children" who have fulfilled every promise of their youth. He and Paderewski are the only pianists who can draw really big audiences, and, what is more, he can hold them enthralled until the very end of a two-hour program. For the Hofmann Sunday matinees which will be given February 19 and 26, Greenbaum has secured the Columbia and for the only evening concert, Thursday night, February 23, Christian Science Hall.

Sigmund Beel's Sunday Concert

Our own Sigmund Beel has certainly demonstrated that he is entitled to a position in the very front rank of the world's great violinists and a great crowd will no doubt gather at Christian Science Hall this Sunday afternoon, February 5, to hear his final program, which, by the way, is one of the most interesting, beautiful and novel offerings ever presented in this city. There will be four works given for the first time in this city. The program includes the old "Chaconne" by Vitali, the very modern and brilliant "Concerto" by Saint-Saens, an unaccompanied Bach "Sonata," "Two Irish Airs," an Eposito number; a "Melodie Tartare" by Kosloff, and the "Perpetum Mobile" of Novacek. Gyula Ormay will be the assisting pianist.

"The Arcadians" Coming

The next attraction at the Columbia, commencing Monday, February 13, will be the big production of "The Arcadians" which Charles Frohman is to send here with a company of unusual strength. Gilbert Childs, Marie Shields, Johnny Osbourne, Vernon Davidson, Alice Russoh, Moya Mannering, Edward Morris and Ruth Thorpe are at the head of the large company. The advance sale of seats begins Thursday.

"The Girl in the Taxi" Taxing Columbia

"The Girl in the Taxi" is taxing the capacity of the Columbia at every performance and with 1,600 theatergoers nightly she is making herself one of the most popular persons of the season. The entire town is talking about "The Girl in the Taxi."

Merle's New Play at the Alcazar

"The Fullback" which is to be given its first presentation on any stage next Monday evening at the Alcazar, is a comedy of American college life by Martin V. Merle, author of several successful plays. Its premiere is made here by special arrangement with Selwyn & Company who hold the producing rights and will present it in New York next season. The author has just returned from the East where he closed negotiations for the New York production. It is now the custom of Eastern managers to give some of their new plays tryout productions in the better class stock companies and San Francisco was decided upon by Selwyn & Co. owing to the splendid company at the Alcazar and the fact that

Merle is a San Francisco man. The production of "The Fullback" will mark the first new effort to be presented at the Alcazar since its opening in Sutter street. The entire production will be made under the personal direction of Fred J. Butler, assisted by the author. Bertram Lytell will play the title role and charming Evelyn Vaughan will be his sweetheart. They will be supported by the full strength of the Alcazar Stock Co. Martin Merle is the author of "The Light Eternal" which is now in its sixth successful season on the road and of "Silver Threads" which is in its second season and which will be seen in San Francisco in the spring. He is a California college man himself, which fact lends interest to the production. In the football scene the playing will be done in view of the audience by picked teams of local professional players. A brass band and scores of enthusiastic "rooters" will enhance the realism.

Next Week at the Orpheum

Frank Tinney, the famous burnt cork comedian, will be the headliner at the Orpheum next week. Tinney is also an excellent pianist. Miss Amy Butler, the diminutive comedienne, will appear with what she calls "Her Big Quartette." This tiny actress has many musical comedy successes to her credit and is a capital vocalist. Maxim's Models will be an artistic feature of the coming bill. They will give living reproductions of world famous paintings. Comedy, novelty and acrobatics, will compose the specialty to be presented by the Reed Brothers. Next week will be the last of Madame Vallecita and her trained leopards; Neff and Starr; Hugh Lloyd and Harry Tate's London company in the automobile skit "Motoring."

Ye Liberty Offers "Brewster's Millions"

The supreme comedy success, "Brewster's Millions," will be the offering of the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, for the week commencing next Monday evening. Twice before have the transbay stock players been presented in this fantastic comedy and both times capacity houses have been the rule, and in all probability the same condition will prevail next week. For nothing more attractive in the comedy line has been seen upon the American stage for many years than "Brewster's Millions." George Fried will appear again as "Monty" Brewster and an excellent cast and production will be provided. "The White Sister" will be the following bill.

Mark Twain as a Frontier Editor

A man who knew Mark Twain in the early days said:

"All that part of his early writings are lost to posterity, I believe. I don't suppose there is a copy of the paper extant anywhere. The fire that destroyed Virginia City years ago consumed the files of the Territory Enterprise, and the only other complete file was one that Flood and O'Brien compiled at a cost of forty thousand dollars by sending canvassers all over Nevada and California in search of back numbers of the paper, paying any price for such copies as they needed to make their file complete. The only way to prove title to scores of mining claims depended upon the records published in those copies of the Territory Enterprise. Eventually Jim Flood presented the complete file to the San Francisco public library, and it too was destroyed by the great fire of four years ago."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—We find very little change in the industrial and financial list at the close of the week unless it be a slight betterment in feeling in banking and commercial circles covering a wide area. This sentiment has been largely induced by the very heavy purchases in new bond issues by individuals and institutions that seem to have passed the point of fear on the railway rate question and pending the Tobacco and Standard Oil decisions. In fact, it can be said that there has been a steady volume of absorption of the standard railway and industrial stocks on the New York Stock Exchange by the small but careful investor, which has never failed to be a good sign for the future of the security market generally. Since the placing of the order for the 176,000 tons of rails by the New York Central there has been a fair volume of orders from other railways which has given material encouragement in the steel outlook for a substantial recovery. There lies the strength in the industrial world for greater activity. We believe that greater cheerfulness will prevail in Wall Street ere long as a result of railway rate increases and that greater activity will result and higher prices obtain for all stocks of merit.

Wheat—January has passed without any important revival of merchandising or speculative interest in wheat or flour or any evidence of material decrease in supplies. There is no apparent approach to an export outlet for our surplus. The buyer is confident and has only to indicate his desires to have his wants speedily filled and usually at close prices. Developments in the foreign field are even more depressing from the wheat owners' standpoint than in this country. Argentine is evidently bent on not repeating the the mistake made by herself and the United States a year ago and is putting her wheat on sale as freely as though importing countries were not independent. While it is too early to talk of the conditions of the growing crop, it is well known that an important area in the southwest went into the winter very dry and much of the wheat sown has failed to germinate. This grain has in many instances been found to be as dry in the ground as in the bin. Favorable conditions are necessary from the beginning of the growing season and in any event there is a situation in this important section that is unprecedented.

Corn has made a better showing than any of the other grains during the last week. Prices at the last were about the same as the week before. In view of the fact that the new speculative demand, following the Argentine crop losses, had spent its force, while primary receipts had increased enormously, this steadiness of the market was a little remarkable. It was based largely on the belief that there would be no great accumulation of supplies previous to the opening of spring work on the farm and also on the theory that an export call would develop for corn on all dips in prices. Export demand has been in evidence during the last week here and elsewhere, although exporters continue to assert that European wants are supplied for the present.

Cotton—The market for future delivery during the last week has been mostly a waiting affair and prices have fluctuated in a very narrow range. The movement to market was again ahead of the corresponding figures for the same week last year and it will only require a movement from this time on in keeping with last year after this date to bring the commercial crop up to 12,000,000 bales. Business with Manchester is less buoyant and demand from Lancashire spinners has become smaller. Great Britain has already secured about 1,000,000 bales more than last year and takings by the Continent are now only about 100,000 bales behind last year. American manufacturers are buying from hand to mouth and will probably adhere to this policy. We think the cotton market is a good sale.

A Bachelor's Queer Will

The highly original will of an eccentric bachelor, Emil von Bizony, is published in the Hungarian papers. The deceased, the brother of a well known Hungarian deputy, was sixty-five years old, detested women, and lived on a war footing with all his relations. Although a wealthy owner of a great deal of land, Herr von Bizony lived so frugally that he did not spend the tenth part of his large income. In his will he bequeathed all his real and personal property to his twelve draught horses. As executors of the will he named the Society for the Protection of Animals at Budapesth, stipulating that the interest on his property should be devoted to the care of these twelve animals, and that upon the death of one of them another aged horse was to be taken in and cared for, so that the number of twelve might always be maintained. Herr von Bizony's relations were naturally amazed at the contents of the will, and the deputy, Herr Alusius Bizony, will dispute it. Negotiations have been commenced with the above mentioned society, and $20,000 was offered it, but refused. The society will bring an action against the Bizony family for the retention of the property, which is worth about $200,000.

Dauntless

"Sir, I wish to make your daughter my wife!"

The old man hesitated. "Hadn't you better see her mother" he asked gently, after thinking a moment.

"I've seen her mother and it doesn't make any difference—I'm willing to take the chances!" exclaimed the youth with all the ardor of honest love.

Mrs. Herman Oelrichs, who was making her bow to society, and he confesses that he was so nervous that he forgot the first figure and had to be coached. Ned says that the most successful period of the club was when the dances were given in Odd Fellows' Hall. That was when the Hopkins girls, Miss Caro Crockett, Miss Alice Simpkins, Miss McNutt, Miss Mary Belle Gwin and Miss Mollie Thomas—all matrons now—were blushing debutantes with their hearts in their heels. There came a time of opposition and for two years the Greenway club suspended while Mrs. Monroe Salisbury lorded it over society; but it was revived and is a very lively institution today.

Dancing and wining are very serious matters to Greenway. He has tipped glasses with three generations of bibeurs and has presided over the debuts of two generations of buds; so why shouldn't he take them seriously. He has learned not to be too self-confident in social matters. In the earlier days he referred all his doubts to a charming lady whose tact and judgment were flawless and in following her advice he never erred. When she died he made it the rule, on the rare occasions when consultation was necessary, to consult two or three women with daughters growing up.

As to the wining, Ned needs no advice. Years ago one of the Mumms advised him never to retire without first drinking a glass of beer. He has been doing that ever since. And he never tries to mix whiskey or cocktails with champagne. How much wine can he drink? I don't think he has ever exhausted his capacity. "On the day that I received my appointment from the Mumm people," he says, "I drank twenty-three pints and remained perfectly sober."

And about that widely heralded book of social reminiscences? I have asked him about that book. "I shall not begin it," he said, "until I stop drinking wine." In the name of chalk-stones, I wonder when that will be!

to be found in all its vigor in the closing paragraph of his monograph. He relates that one day a man announced that at a certain hour he would stand on the steps of the capital and expound a plan for reconciliation between capital and labor. He did appear, and what he said was what Christ said: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them." And the people cried "Lynch him, lynch him!"

In so brief a space as this article must occupy it is impossible to give more than a vague hint of a wit so multiform and versatile as Bierce's, appearing as it does in all sorts of shapes, postures and garbs. Here is a man who has exploited every stream of humor that has ever enriched the literary meadows. A critic of literature, of government and of life, he is at times as droll as Rabelais, at times as caustic as Swift; he has vindicated the much disputed maxim that ridicule is the test of truth; he has been as comic as Butler, as dexterous and as mordant as Voltaire, as apt at the finesse of words as Pope. As a humorist, like Horace he has seen the absurdity of pedants, the presumption of political pretenders. Like Lucian he has blended irony with narrative, taking his readers into topsy-turveydom to facilitate the flow of his acid merriment. Like Poe he has taken us into the realm of mystery and builded tales that enchant and bewilder. He has written poems that are triumphs of graceful expression and that are penetrated with passion and enthusiasm. And this man who has been writing for forty years is now having his works collected for the first time! No wonder he has remained in obscurity. No wonder—for Bierce is not the man to make overtures to Fame. He never asked a publisher to print a book. He never even peddled his wares. Almost since the close of the war he has worked as a journalist, and always he has maintained his independence—even of editors and newspaper proprietors. When he wrote what pleased his employers it was because it pleased him. Though a sceptic and a cynic he never worked with unimpassioned heart. And while there is but little in his work to attest the fact he is a sensitive impulsive man, an ardent crusader in the cause of truth whose earnest nature has imparted fire to his matchless wit.

Reading of the whole agony, choking but self-possessed, she read: the Vizcaya, Almirante Oquendo, and the rest; the death of Villamil, he who at least redeemed the promise made to the Mother of his God in Cadiz before he put to sea.

And as she read the old man gave no sign, sitting impassive as a fakir, or like an Indian warrior at the stake.

She went on reading; the fleet steamed through the hell of shot and shell, took fire, was beached, blew up, and still he gave no sign.

Cervera steps on board the conqueror's ship, gives up his sword, and the old man sat still.

When all was finished, and the last vessel burning on the rocks, slowly the tears fell down his old brown cheeks, and he broke silence. "Virgen de Guadalupe, has not one escaped?" and the girl, looking at him through her now misty eyes, "No, papa, God has so willed it. . . . What is wrong with your moustache?"

Then, with an effort, he took down his grief, said quietly, "I must change my hairdresser," got up, and offering his daughter his arm, walked out impassible, through the thick ranks of the defeated foe.

How the Panama Fair Advanced Sutro Forest Tract 10 Years

Every man in California knows what the Panama Fair will do for San Francisco
What the Fair will do for San Francisco is what it will do for Sutro Forest Tract
It will advance the interest of Sutro Forest Tract fully 10 years
The Fair makes Sutro Forest shares worth several times as much today as they were last week

What the Fair Will Do

The Fair will bring a hundred thousand people to San Francisco to live
The Fair will bring a hundred thousand permanent residents to San Francisco in addition to hundreds of thousands of visitors
The Fair will bring the wide-awake prosperous citizens to San Francisco who will wish to build artistic homes within the limits of the city
The Fair will make the Sutro Forest Tract investment not only safe but highly profitable
The Fair made St. Louis a modern western metropolis
With permanent solid improvements
Which follows in the wake of all Fairs
And which will follow the San Francisco Fair

Thousands Will Come

Hundreds of thousands of people from all parts of the world will visit San Francisco
Will become enamored with our climate
Will be permeated with the spirit of this city
Will breathe the atmosphere of California
And all these things
Will promote the interests of San Francisco
And make it a larger and more prosperous metropolis
Even more than it is today
Every new citizen
Within the boundaries of the city
Will add to its prosperity
And will want to build a home
And will naturally seek the park-like district you know as Sutro Forest Tract
Shrewd men of business
Trained in judging conditions and values
Have expressed their opinions of Sutro Forest
And its future
Here follow a few of their remarks:

J. GOLDBERG
(President Goldberg, Bowen & Co.)

From the point of view of the retail merchant whose profits must depend principally upon the trade with those who live in San Francisco, I wish to add my recommendation to your undertaking, in creating within the bounds of San Francisco a residence district of such a character that people of good taste and adequate means will wish to build artistic homes rather than to seek locations elsewhere.

JAMES WOODS
(Manager Hotel St. Francis)

From the hotel man's point of view, nothing commends itself more than those features in a city which will attract visitors. I have noted with a great deal of pleasure your proposal to purchase the Sutro Forest Tract and build winding roadways and afford opportunity for the erection of artistic bungalows and homes, surrounded by trees, flowers and shrubs, and the making of it a place where the tourist will wish to go to see the possibilities of development along artistic lines, in a residential district.

JOHN McLAREN
(Superintendent of Golden Gate Park)

If the individual idea is subordinated to the group idea, Sutro Forest can be made into the most beautiful park in the United States.

MARSHALL HALE
(Hale Bros.)

Sutro Forest Tract offers an opportunity to construct attractive homes in the suburbs of San Francisco, which means that we will be able to keep many people here who would otherwise go out of the city to live.

HORACE H. ALLEN
(President, Down Town Association)

I want to commend the undertaking in the matter of saving for San Francisco the Sutro Forest, or that part of it called "San Miguel Rancho." I hope the enterprise will succeed and sufficient capital be obtained from the public-spirited citizens of this city, who will show by their subscriptions that they are behind the endeavor to preserve this beautiful property.

GEORGE WILLIAMS HOOPER
(Lumber Merchant)

As the business is outlined, my intention is to subscribe for the purchase of a liberal amount of stock, which I consider is as good an investment as can be had today. I cannot see why the entire issue should not be subscribed for within the next thirty days. The opportunity offered the public in this case is one that does not come to them often. It is something that should appeal to them both as investors and as public-spirited citizens.

H. O. TROWBRIDGE
(Capitalist)

It is the only instance I have ever seen where every one was given an opportunity to buy stock in a big land company on the same basis. Under the offer of this company the man with $1000 can buy ten shares of stock at exactly the same price that the capitalist does who puts in $10,000.

DR. HARTLAND LAW
(Capitalist)

The merchants and capitalists of San Francisco, as well as those who have only a few thousand dollars to invest, should subscribe promptly for the stock of this company, which is organized not only for profit, but for the beautification and advancement of San Francisco.

WILLIAM J. DUTTON
(President Fireman's Fund Insurance Company)

I know of no enterprise recently planned which means so much for the advancement and betterment of this city than the aims and purposes of the Residential Development Company of San Francisco.

GEORGE A. NEWHALL
(H. M. Newhall & Co.)

The scheme is all right, and I have subscribed for stock because I think it is a good buy, and also because I want to see a first-class residence district established in the suburbs of San Francisco.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 33,681, Dept. No. 10.

PLINY E. RITNER, Plaintiff, vs. GRACE I. RITNER, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, Send Greeting to: Grace I. Ritner, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion of plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 18th day of January, A. D. 1911. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE ON APPLICATION FOR LEAVE TO MORTGAGE REAL PROPERTY

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 8131, Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of THERESA J. O'CONNOR, Deceased.

Annie L. Jones, the Administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Theresa J. O'Connor, deceased, having filed herein her duly verified petition praying for an order of this Court authorizing and directing her to borrow the sum of Six Hundred Dollars ($600.00) or such lesser sum as the Court may deem necessary wherewith to pay the debts of said estate, and to make the necessary improvements thereon, as set forth in said petition on file herein, and for the purpose of securing the re-payment of such loan to mortgage to the lender of such money certain real property of said estate situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Church Street, distant two hundred and twenty-seven feet northerly from the northerly line of 24th Street; thence northerly along said line of Church Street thirty-three (33) feet; thence at right angles easterly one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet; thence at right angles southerly thirty-three (33) feet; thence at right angles westerly one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet to the point of commencement. Being a portion of Horner's Addition Block No. 64.

It is therefore ordered, that all persons interested in said estate appear at this Court in Courtroom of Department No. 10 of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, at the Grant Building, Seventh and Market Streets, on the 27th day of February, 1911, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, then and there to show cause why said prayer of said petition should not be granted and the real property within described mortgaged to secure a loan to said estate for Six Hundred Dollars ($600.00), or such lesser amount as the Court shall deem meet, and

It is ordered that notice of the time appointed for hearing said petition, and the Order to Show Cause, be published for four successive weeks in the "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation, published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

For further particulars in said petition you are hereby referred to said Petition now on file herein, which said petition is made a part hereto.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 32,385.

ADELE NOVARESE, Plaintiff, vs. JOSEPH ROBERT NOVARESE, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, Send Greeting to Joseph Robert Novarese, Defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed herein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 26th day of October, A. D. 1910.

ORDER DIRECTING NOTICE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—No. 10350. Dept. No. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of LUCINDA POINDEXTER, Deceased.

AXEL E. BERN, having presented to this Court and filed herein his duly verified petition, claiming to be entitled to a conveyance from Mary S. Merrill, as the executor of the estate of Lucinda Poindexter, deceased, of that certain real property described as Lots 7 and 8 in Block 2, Laymance Subdivision of Warner Tract, in Brooklyn Township, Alameda County, California; and it appearing to this Court that said Lucinda Poindexter in her lifetime entered into a written contract with the said Axel E. Bern to convey said real property described in said verified petition and in this order, and that said Lucinda Poindexter died before making said conveyance, and that said Axel E. Bern was, before the death of said deceased, and is now, entitled to a conveyance of said property described herein, and good cause appearing therefor;

It is hereby ordered that the hearing of said petition be set for the 13th day of February, 1911, at the hour of ten o'clock A. M. at the Courtroom of this Court, Department No. Ten thereof;

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be served upon said Mary S. Merrill as said executrix, personally, and that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks before said hearing in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Auto Notes

In view of the fact that not many radical changes are observed in the mechanical details of the cars exhibited at the auto shows, novelties in body construction receive most attention from the crowds. One of the newest things is seen on the torpedo type of body shown by the Lozier. This model is termed the "Lakewood" and in place of a chauffeur's seat on the running board, this is incorporated in one of the side doors. To place this side seat in service, the door is dropped outward and downward, disclosing side arm and back. When closed and out of service the seat has the appearance of a flush-sided door.

A shipment of 30 horsepower Autocar roadsters is reported for San Francisco from the factory. These cars are due to arrive the early part of next week.

Since the report lately went abroad that the four factories which make up the United States Rubber Co. would operate under one sales management, there has been considerable speculation in tire circles as to just what the outcome would be. Some expect that in the near future the four different brands of tires will be sold by a single concern. The Morgan & Wright distributors, Weinstock-Nichols Co. do not think that such will be the case.

A feature of the coming motordrome races at Elmhurst will be the competition of Pope Hartford cars driven by Jack Fleming and Bert Dingley, the two Pacific Coast pilots who have achieved national distinction. Both of these men have won their chief prominence as road race drivers, but Dingley has recently become one of the most famous of track drivers because of his sensational performance on the Los Angeles Motordrome, January 14.

The Pioneer Automobile Company's new building will be the next notable addition to San Francisco's Automobile Row. This three story structure is now rapidly nearing its last stages of construction and will be ready for occupancy by the Pioneer Automobile Co. near the middle of this month. The sales manager of one of the Eastern factories visited the new building a few days ago and said: "This building will make the handsomest and best arranged automobile garage that I have seen west of New York. What impresses me most favorably is the large amount of glass used in the arrangements for offices, partitions, show windows, etc. Surely the Chalmers, Lozier and Hudson people should be proud of the new home of their San Francisco representatives."

R. M. Murden, manager of the Haynes Auto Sales Company's repair department, is Automobile Row's most recent benedict. Bob has just led to the altar Miss Cleo White, a San Francisco girl. Murden came out from the Haynes Factory where his brother is general superintendent and where he himself held responsible positions successively in the testing, repair and parts departments, to take charge of the Haynes service department in this territory.

"In order to get the maximum service from your tires," says C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of the Diamond Rubber Company, "it is necessary that you keep them away from oil. Oil soon softens the rubber. Under this condition the tire can't possibly last as long as otherwise. Never let the oil escaping from the car in the garage run and stand about the tires. Never let your car stand in oil puddles on the street. A little more care of the axles in the matter of washers at the ends or in using a heavier grade of oil, will save tire money."

"The importance of the place achieved by the commercial vehicle in the last year is well illustrated," says Walter Morris, local Autocar distributor, "by the consideration given it at the New York Show. Advices received from New York declare that a large share of the interest in the Madison Square Garden's exhibition centers in the display of trucks to which the last two weeks of the show are to be solely devoted."

E. C. Collins of the Cartercar Auto Co. reports that a shipment of 1911 Cartercars has just been unloaded and the machines are now being equipped for immediate delivery.

With the completion of the new works of the Lozier Motor Company at Detroit, Michigan, next spring, Mr. John G. Perrin, superintendent of the present works at Plattsburgh, N. Y., will take charge of the combined works of the Lozier Motor Company at Detroit, Michigan and Plattsburgh, N. Y., with the title of Chief Engineer and Factory Manager. Both of these plants will be operated to their fullest capacity, although the Plattsburgh plant will devote its energies to producing finished parts and supplies, while at the Detroit works all assembling will be done.

Bank wreckers have a new force to deal with since the automobile has become so handy in pursuit races. One of the liveliest races a gang of yeggmen ever had was in the twelve-hour chase just completed in Lenawee County, Michigan, which resulted in the capture of four bank robbers and the conveyance of them to the county jail in a Hudson roadster which had been driven two hundred miles in a snow storm to locate the bandits.

T. V. Saunders, secretary of Hall & Co., the local wholesale jewelers, has joined the ranks of local motorists. After a thorough investigation of the market he has purchased a Haynes Touring Car.

E. A. Christensen has equipped his Pope Toledo with Morgan and Wright Nobby Tread tires furnished by Weinstock-Nichols Co. Mr. Christensen is an ardent Nobby Tread advocate, having used none other for the last year.

Remedy Worse Than the Disease

A man had been called as a witness to prove the correctness of the bill of a physician.

"Let us get at the facts of the case," said the lawyer, who was doing a cross-examination turn "Didn't the doctor make several visits after the patient was out of danger?"

"No, sir," answered the nurse. "I considered the patient in danger as long as the doctor continued his visits."

She—So you are sure that your new play will be a success?

He—Certain, why, even the manager blushed when he read it.

Arlington Villa Sites

"Arlington Villa Sites" with one-quarter to one acre lots (only 50 in the tract) has a $10,000 building restriction!

Big generous lots so your neighbor will not crowd in and shut out your sunshine—

Big generous restrictions so your neighborhood will not be spoiled by inferior buildings—

This is all within 5 minutes walk of the Tunnel station of both Southern Pacific electric and Key Route in Northbrae and also the same distance from the Union Station of all three Southern Pacific electric lines in front of Thousand Oaks.

The view is most inspiring—there is an oak grove on part of the tract.

A Measure to Promote Murder

One of the toughest of all the tough bills introduced at this session of the Legislature is the handiwork of that eminent statesman, Thomas Finn, whose self-sacrificing devotion to the dear people is evidenced by the fact that he serves them not only as a member of that august body, the Senate of the State, but also as Sheriff of this city. Sheriff-Senator Finn's bill provides that the Governor shall not order out the militia to enforce the laws unless asked to do so by the Chief of Police or the Mayor. The motive that inspired this bill seems obvious enough in view of the fact that our municipal government is in the hands of organized labor. The presumption is that in the opinion of the author our municipal authorities would not call for assistance in the event of a strike and incidental disorder. But Sheriff-Senator Finn is inclined to shirk the onus of authorship. He has publicly announced that he introduced the bill in behalf of organized labor. What has organized labor to say touching this mild impeachment? Do the leaders of organized labor who are constantly reiterating their opposition to violence wish to have it understood that the Finn bill is their measure and that it truly reflects their spirit and their sentiment? If so it is time for this community to feel a little startled, for the bill may pass. There is great sympathy between this legislature and organized labor, and also between Senator-Sheriff Finn, despite his curious unsavory connections, and one Hiram W. Johnson. The Sheriff-Senator from the lower level and the pure and undefiled Governor from the heights do politics together. They are bosom, confidential friends. Perhaps the Governor may feel that it would be advisable for him not to have the responsibility of determining just how much bloodshed justifies a call for the militia.

The Cowardly Merchant

Has anybody observed in the daily papers any editorial comment on the vicious Finn bill? Has anybody noted the omission of editorial comment? These are questions that are worth the pondering of the average citizen who wonders why things are as they are and laments the failure of our men of affairs to see them right. A few weeks ago Mr. William L. Gerstle in retiring from the presidency of the Chamber of Commerce read before that body a paper in which he pointed out the evil results of lack of competition in labor. The dailies reported Mr. Gerstle's remarks—all but those dealing with labor. Our esteemed contemporary, the Argonaut, called attention to the omission and characterized our dailies as cowardly. Now we wish to suggest that the dailies are not at all more cowardly in their attitude toward organized labor or more infamous in their betrayal of the interests of this city than many of the members of the Chamber of Commerce. The dailies suppress everything that might displease organized labor not because they love organize labor or its leaders nor because they are in sympathy with union principles. The truth is that the arrogant leaders of organized labor are disliked in every newspaper office in this city, and that our distinguished journalists are quite frank among themselves in discussing their sordid policy of supporting labor in all its contests with capital. This policy is inspired by fear of losing circulation. Now the dailies are much more fearful of losing advertising patronage, and a combination of big advertisers could bring them all to their knees in twenty-four hours. In other words the Chamber of Commerce has the power of coercing the dailies. Were the attempt made our merchants would doubtless be accused of attempting to destroy the liberty of the press, but this would be bald and unvarnished cant. The newspapers have sold their liberty. They have betrayed the government that has guaranteed them liberty. There is very little conscience left in daily journalism, and the merchant who contributes to the support of a daily paper is like the man who warms a viper in his breast.

Dr. Lathrop's Message

Let us keep an eye on the Rev. C. N. Lathrop of our parish. He is pregnant with the enthusiasm that moves stones and charms brutes, and he will not rest until half mankind are "like himself possest." From that pious patron of the pulpit, the sacrosanct editor of the Bulletin, we learn that little Dr. Lathrop has sent into "this callous world a ringing message," one with bells on it, we suppose. This message is entitled "Pulpit and Politics." It brings to a callous world the news that we have with us poor people as well as rich people and consequently "an unjust social condition." This is a fact, says this profoundly sagacious clergyman, which it is the business of every Christian citizen to admit, "and once admitting it, to set himself to find out the trouble; and once having decided what the trouble is to set himself to do his best to right it." "There," says the Boughten Bulletin, "is Dr. Lathrop's message, a message to clergy and laymen." And Dr. Lathrop's journalistic admirer thus exhorts us with most persuasive vehemence: "Acknowledge the truth, speak fearlessly of wrongs, seek the remedy, and having found it, do what you can to right those wrongs." A ringing message indeed! It evokes in us the twang of a responsive chord, and we say to Dr. Lathrop and also to the pious and sympathetic editor, Lead on Bombastes Buncombe and Hell Fire for him who first cries hold enough! With unrestrained enthusiasm, and absolutely without equivocation, we respond to the ringing appeal, we acknowledge the deplorable fact that there are poor people as well as rich people in the world! Indeed we cannot see how anything is to be gained by denying it; and for that reason if for none other we acquiesce in the ringing impeachment of God's workmanship. But as to finding out the trouble, and then doing our best to right it, that is another matter. We are with Dr. Lathrop heart and soul, but when it comes to trouble-finding we defer to his superior sagacity. After you, good clergyman. Your relations with God are much more intimate than ours. We suspect that God had some ulterior reason for not making us all capable of acquiring riches and for causing some of us to experience the pinch of poverty; and as humble laymen we would not have the presumption to inquire. We suspect moreover that the spread of poverty is one of the designs of Providence. We suspect this because there are many members of Dr. Lathrop's profession converting savages at the divine behest, and no savage is ever poor until he becomes a Christian. For riches consist not in the extent of one's possessions but in the fewness of one's wants, and the savage has everything he wants until civilization gets him. Perhaps on investigation Dr. Lathrop may learn that God believes with Daniel who tells us "He is not poor that has little, but he that desires much." And perhaps in the end Dr. Lathrop may come to the conclusion that instead of holding some of the greedy and extravagant rich up to obloquy as he has done, and thus appealing to the prejudices and passions of the poor by inciting them to hatred of all people who are rich, it might be more judicious, more in keeping with the ideals of the ecclesiastical profession and less in keeping with the manners of the demagogue for him to expound nothing but the New Testament. To bring that to the hearts of men is after all the great desideratum. There is "message" enough in that for all our purposes. By preaching it with zeal, with sincerity and with intelligence a minister may do far more toward stirring the hearts of the rich to generous impulses, far more toward ameliorating the condition of the poor than by trying to solve the mysteries of the ways of Providence and indulging the notion that after solving them he may be able to alter the scheme of things sublunary. Looking into the seeds of time we hazard the prediction that the rich will be with us as well as the poor long after little Dr. Lathrop gets through his self-imposed task of setting things right, but we are prepared nevertheless to watch him sympathetically as he goes along removing obstacles from the path of the oncoming millennium.

The American Desmoulins

Speaking of the Republican League which was organized at Washington by a little band of Chautauquan statesmen and magazine incendiaries, Mr. John Temple Graves says "The Hearst newspapers and the Independence League have been the matrix of its inspiration." Mr. Graves believes that the new league is destined to make important history, and as he was the Independence League candidate for Vice-President he would like to have posterity informed that he was a personage of some consequence in the opening of an epoch. Otherwise he would be willing to let the Hearst papers take all the credit if any there be in connection with the current revolution of American politics. As a matter of fact the Hearst newspapers were the instigators of the progressive movement. This movement is nothing more nor less than a renewal of what Emerson calls the primal antagonism, of the intermittent battle of patrician and plebeian, of conservatism and radicalism; and of this movement William R. Hearst is the Prophet. Long has he incarnated that star-eyed Goddess who kicks with hoofs, who runs to egotism and bloated self-conceit, to asinine pretension, to chaos and reaction. The La Follettes and Colliers, the Pinchots and the Hamptons are all disciples of Hearst without knowing their master. William R. Hearst is the Camille Desmoulins of American journalism and American politics. "It is for us who live," said Desmoulins in his La France Libre, "who are now in possession of the earth to make laws in our turn. But, as one is never in complete possession of this earth, as there is never a complete clean slate, we must expel those who are too long in making room for us and are in our way." This was the work which Camille undertook in his Journal, to which he devoted himself by decrying men of virtue and moderation, by destroying respect for dead statesmen whose memory was revered, and by libeling the conservative members of the Constituent Assembly. At an earlier period he conducted the Revolutions de France et de Brabant in which he assailed all the powers which the first Constitution tried to establish or preserve by regeneration. All the men then in the public eye he defamed and calumniated, and incessantly urged the people to take more power. He was Hearst's prototype, as Hearst is the prototype ot all the lesser muckrakers behind the Republican League. Like Camille, Mr. Hearst started the ball rolling, and in the event of the revolutionizing of our government on the principles of the Republican League he will be easily the most powerful individual in all the nation. Government by the people with no institutional safeguards will of course mean government by the power that suggestionizes the mob; and Mr. Hearst wields more of that power than any five journalists in the country. Camille Desmoulins wielded it in France and he brought on the Terror, and one day he repented and suggested clemency, and his life went out on the guillotine. Sometimes by inadvertence the people are just.

The Hearst Philosophy

There is nothing so difficult as to read history aright, to see how powerfully circumstances have influenced the opinions and feelings of men, "how often," as Macaulay says, "vices pass into virtues and paradoxes into axioms." But as difficult as it is to form a correct estimate of other ages, it is still more difficult to see what is passing in our midst. It is when the hour of conflict is over that we come to a right understanding of the strife. And so it is that now "Battle Bob" La Follette and some of the other half-baked statesmen who are trying to float to glory on the largest wave in sight have no conception of the force that gave it impetus. They are quarreling among themselves as to which one of them is entitled to the credit of having created the tide when as a matter of fact they had nothing to do with it. The Hearst newspapers are alone the authors of the mood receptive wherever it exists, for the principles of the Republican League. All those principles are reducible to one which is embodied in the maxim, Vov populi, vox Dei, the maxim that justified the guillotine of the French Revolution. The Hearst newspapers began propagating that maxim long before "Battle Bob" La Follette was seized with the ambition to become a tribune of the people. They never employed the maxim as a shibboleth, they never argued the divinity of the people's voice, but they assumed as a self-evident proposition that might makes right, and that the people having the power to make government it was right for them to abolish all checks on themselves and it was impossible for them to go wrong. This briefly is the philosophy of the Hearst newspapers. It is the philosophy which they have been expounding for many years; and the acceptance of the postulates of this philosophy as truisms is essential to the toleration of such things as the recall and the referendum and the various schemes to undermine the institutions of the country. All the pin-headed statesmen, all the demagogues who have got into office by advocating political devices calculated to give the people supreme and unobstructed power are indebted to the Hearst papers. These papers have made the maunderings and vaporings of La Follette and all his kidney seem like the quintessence of divine wisdom. It was these papers that first generated dissatisfaction and discontent; that first magnified evils and ills; that made it the fashion to assassinate character by wholesale; in short, that by creating universal suspicion and distrust precipitated the chaotic situation in public affairs existing at this moment. Every toad that has crawled into the seat of an eagle owes a debt of gratitude to the Hearst papers, and today when possession of public office is a badge either of imbecility or cunning or insolence, this being the logical result of the Hearst propaganda, the proprietor of the Hearst papers may at once justly point with pride to himself and to a public policy that fluctuates between the awkwardness of unconscious incompetence and the arrogance of unbridled demagogism. This whole subject we discuss with an air of authority because we have been a student of the Hearst papers and because we know something of the principles of the Hearst brand of journalism. Mr. Hearst is the prototype of all the muckrakers. He has revolutionized American journalism. He has demonstrated that the way to make a paper pay is to cater to the passions and prejudices of the mob. "Get circulation," is his motto; "get circulation and ads. will follow." When the virtue of this motto began to dawn on the perceptions of magazine editors and other unscrupulous journalists Mr. Hearst became the object of the sincerest form of flattery, but despite competition he is still supreme in his own field.

The Awakening of the Plutocracy

Our politicians are devoting so much of their attention to commercial affairs these days it is but natural that our captains of industry should begin to pay some attention to politics. Those that have always interested themselves in politics have done so only to the extent of buying what they wanted at the government counter. But the great bulk of the business interests have held aloof altogether, disdaining to do anything more than contribute funds to the party that pledged itself to give them protection. Now it has come to pass that to no party can our big business men look with absolute assurance for the promotion of their interests. The politicians having created widespread distrust of all business and progagated the notion that the people must fortify themselves against the aggressions of capital wherever it is accumulating, the statesmen of all parties consider it to be to their interest to pay deference to the sentiment of the hour without regard for the old-fashioned principles of government. As a result of this state of affairs self-interest is making patriots of the predatory rich. Fat and sleek financiers long believed to have no enthusiasm for anything but the market are now sitting up and taking notice of the new democracy. They are emerging from their luxurious clubs and getting in touch with the common people. They have begun to concern themselves about such things as the dignity of the State and the stability of government. The unscrupulous among them are no longer looking to their agents for special privileges; they will be quite content to see our institutions maintained with something of their old vitality. Our demagogues have really done some good. While perverting public sentiment they have corrected the impulses of some derelict citizens and induced them to take the public into their confidence for the public weal as well as their own good. The discussion of important public questions is no longer monopolized by blatherskite editors and mushroom statesmen. Hardly a day passes now without some corporation magnate coming out of his upholstered chair to protest against the mischievous machinations of politicians and to appeal to the people to subdue their choler and to realize that they are being led into evil ways. But while there is much apprehension there is not yet any organized effort to stem the tide of hysteria or backfire the rascals in public office. The bankers of New York have sounded a keynote, but a very faint one. They gave their last annual banquet in honor of the Constitution of the United States, which ex-Governor Frank S. Black alluded to as that "devenerated instrument." Mr. Black gave the bankers some advice. He told them "it is as needful sometimes to speak as it is sometimes to fight, and in most cases if the speech is in time there will be no fight." It was the business of men of sense, continued Mr. Black, to quit whispering in private when demagogues and disturbers are busy and to come out and give the people the benefit of their reasoning in the open. Demagogues always start, he said, with an advantage no fair disputant ever has, and that is why their course should be checked early. Their first aim is to excite, and the excited man is hard to reason with. After expressing his disapproval of the recall and referendum and the election of Senators by direct vote, Mr. Black continued:

"The whole country, including you, ought to change its tactics. The muckraker and the demagogue have done harm enough and ought to be sent to the rear. Their message of distrust and turbulence is neither sincere nor true. Evils do exist, dishonest men are everywhere, the rich are sometimes arrogant and the poor are sometimes oppressed, but these are only items in the gigantic volume of American life. The vast majority of American business is honestly done. The vast majority of individual fortunes are got by methods honest men approve, the vast majority of laboring men are getting what they earn. And the standard of enlightenment, of honor and morality is higher than it ever was before. And all the unequalled opportunities of the country and the age are open to every man who seeks them, no matter how poor his start. Twenty-five years ago half of the men in this hall were receiving smaller incomes than the bricklayer gets today.

"Why not say things as they are? The disturber has for years and at the public cost ridden at the head of a continuous and noisy parade, while the people stood by dazed and business suffered. Why not let him walk a while and give the business man a chance to catch up? We have been too long excited and misled by counterfeits, and I believe the people are eager for the truth and willing to be just. If they are not yet fully awake they at least have begun to rub their eyes."

These are fine sentiments. The advice is good. It would be well were the bankers of San Francisco to heed it. Also the merchants and all men whose interests are involved as well as those who have a genuine feeling of love for the institutions of their country. But why do nothing more than speak out? Why go on supporting the demagogic and degenerate newspapers that are alone responsible for all the mischief that is being done?

Perspective Impressions

Some of our legislators are in favor of big bounties for coyotes. Why not include Senators and Assemblymen?

Our respect for Mark Twain has much increased since we learned that he didn't go to his grave unconscious of the true character of Colonel Roosevelt.

The members of the Police Department were the only men in San Francisco who didn't know the tiger was rampant. And even now they don't know that three lottery companies are in full blast. When vice puts up 'tis policy to be deaf, dumb and blind.

If the recall is such a good thing why not give us a chance to recall each and every act of the present Legislature including the rotten election of Works?

How near the present legislature comes to representing the people of this State we shall be able to judge by the volume of enthusiasm that is stirred up for Roosevelt on his next visit to California.

"Weak Brother" Pardee is against the proposal to consolidate San Francisco and Oakland. So is every Oakland politician who is conscious of the importance of conserving his political resources.

The Chronicle is certain the three-fourths verdict will "assure justice," but favors unanimity for capital cases. Is assurance tainted with scepticism?

William J. Bryan has declared himself in favor of Champ Clark for President. For the purposes of the campaign Mr. Bryan incarnates the process of elimination. Champ is now out of the running.

That the Irish of San Francisco brought with them from the old sod the tendency to scrap among themselves is evident from the fact that St. Patrick's Day will be celebrated by two factions.

Suggestions for McLaren

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Every little while I hear it remarked that Golden Gate Park is finely managed. The newspapers have said this so often that people have come to believe it. The people who are most pleased with the Park are the people who ride through it in their automobiles; not the people who make of it a pleasure ground and who know every spot in it. I know every tree in the Park and I know something of what it lacks. It is lacking among other things in clean, well-kept latrines and in directions as to where the few that are there can be found. This is a matter of no small importance to men and women who stroll through the Park with their children. There is a decided lack of management in the Children's Playground. It is run in a haphazard fashion. On Sundays the donkeys and goats which are a source of great pleasure to the little ones are put into service at any old hour. Nobody knows just when they are to appear, and sometimes they don't appear until the noon hour. As a consequence parents who have an hour or so to spare for the benefit of the children on Sundays don't know when to take them to the playground. There are nuisances in Golden Gate Park, the worst being a wire fence that stretches through the trees east of the bandstand. Why that wire fence? It compels people to take circuitous routes. Must we all stick to the roads and take a chance at being run down by automobiles? Golden Gate Park is showy from the roads, but there are eyesores in spots—for example just north of Prayerbook Cross where somebody permitted a contractor to cut away a graceful slope and create a red-rock quarry from which he took material to grade streets in the neighborhood. Does anybody know why this was done; why a piece of the Park was virtually destroyed?

Yours truly,
—Thomas F. Kennedy.

The Dread Tyrant

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I was much surprised to read in the Bulletin that Mr. F. J. Heney made the statement at Sacramento that Judge Bahrs was the only incumbent of the bench ever beaten for re-election and that he was beaten because he wasn't nominated. Fresh in my recollection are the cases of Daingerfield, Sanderson and Wallace who were nominated and who were beaten at the polls. The case of Daingerfield is one that might be pondered to advantage at this time. Daingerfield was not a brilliant judge but nobody ever questioned his honesty, and he was surely as competent as some of the men now on the bench. He was beaten because of a brutal campaign waged against him by the Examiner, and as everybody knows the Examiner fought him because he did not have sufficient respect for the power of Mr. Hearst during the trial of a libel case. Hearst pursued him as he has since pursued Elihu Root for personal reasons. Might it not be well to consider how greatly the power of the press would be increased in the event of the recall being applied to judges. What judge would dare give a decision against a powerful newspaper if we had the recall in operation? There is a great deal of talk these days about personal liberty, but as we are now situated the press has the power to curtail every man's liberty. The only redress that a citizen has against the tyranny of the press is such as the law affords, but even now it is pretty hard to find a judge who will give a citizen a square deal in a scrap with a newspaper. How much harder will it be to find one with the recall hanging like a sword over the bench?

VIII—GENERAL E. A. FORBES

By Edward F. O'Day

He isn't full of strange oaths and he isn't bearded like the pard, but, believe me, he is ready at all times to seek the bubble reputation in the cannon's mouth. Although tradition hath made the flinty and steel couch of war his thrice-driven bed of down, he is pretty nearly the mildest mannered man that ever cut a throat. There is nothing grim visaged about his smooth, unwrinkled front, and if the time ever comes when he must cry "havoc" and let slip the dogs of war, he will cry it in a subdued, gentle and dulcet voice. He doesn't dream exclusively of breaches, ambuscadoes, Spanish blades and when he drinks, which is not too often, his healths are not five-fathom deep.

Now you may infer from this negative description that Colonel—I mean General—Edwin Alexander Forbes is no soldier; but you are wrong. Or you may suspect that he has never been to war; and you are right. Colonel—I mean General Edwin Alexander Forbes has never menaced the embattled foe; he has never waved his gleaming falchion on a stricken field; he has never smelled the smokeless powder of actual warfare; he has never devoured the coffee and beans of a real campaign. But it isn't his fault. He has a life to give for his country—would give nine if he had 'em. Only a concatenation of unfortunate circumstances accidentally arrayed in opposition to his heartfelt desire of spilling blood for Uncle Sam prevented him from being a battle-scarred hero; which, you will admit, is pretty tough luck for a soldier.

You see, it was written in the tablet of destiny that Colonel—I mean General Edwin Alexander Forbes—he has been a colonel so long and a general for so short a time that it is hard for me to remember his proper rank—is was written that he should be a soldier. All the Forbes' used to be soldiers. The ancestral home was near Culloden in Scotland and the boys all sallied out with their trusty claymores to take a hand in that glorious scrap. His grandfather belonged to the famous Ninety-third Highlanders. It is one of the treasured memories in the Forbes family that granddad's bare and hairy legs followed the skirl of the pipe from Africa to Spain, from Spain to Belgium and from Belgium to the United States. Granddad fought all over the map. When he had helped the settlement of troubles in Cape Town he went to the Peninsular War; he took a hand in the burning of Washington; and he heard the pibroch at Waterloo. An examination of dates will show that he kept moving at a tremendous pace, but that is neither here nor there.

With a grandfather like that it was no wonder that Edwin Alexander Forbes became a soldier. Edwin Alexander was only nineteen years of age when he joined the National Guard. It was a proud day when he first donned a private's uniform. His pulse beat like a drum; the rhythm of "Scots wha' hae" thundered like martial music through his brain, and the intricacies of "hay-foot, straw-foot" held no mystery for him. For years he burned to burn powder, but the piping times of peace refused obstinately to give way before the skirling times of war, until in 1894, when Private Edwin Alexander Forbes tightened his belt, oiled his rifle, crushed mercy out of his heart and went to Sacramento to take a pot shot at the strikers. He acquitted himself with such stern courage in that terrific conflict that they made him a captain and he went home to weep, like his Macedonian namesake, because there were no more worlds to conquer. But, lo and behold, along came what has been very irreverently dubbed the Yanko-Spanko War, and Captain Forbes was right on the job, breathing defiance to the hated Don. He was commissioned a major in the Eighth California Volunteers and like a dog of war straining at the leash, fidgetted feverishly because they didn't get marching orders soon enough. At last the glorious summons came and Major Forbes, himself the substance of ten thousand soldiers if resolution counts for anything, set out for—the front? Shades of Julius Caesar, no such luck! He set out for Vancouver Barracks. Then he came down to Angel Island and stayed there till the Eighth California was mustered out, with his pipe clay all untarnished, his blade unnicked and nary a tale of battle to hand on to his children. He remained in the National Guard until 1907, rounding out twenty-eight years of service with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, which, of course, is the reason why we have called him colonel. But although he hung his sword over the mantlepiece and despaired of fulfilling his destiny, he by no means relinquished his interest in martial affairs. Not very long ago he made a leisurely trip around the world and in the intervals of writing postcards and visiting cathedrals he studied the military systems of Europe and Asia. Which wasn't a bad thing by any means, for he hadn't been home long when Governor Johnson made him Adjutant-General of the State.

General Forbes has not devoted all his activities to the pursuit of elusive military glory. His has been a well rounded life. He was born in 1860 in Brandy City, Sierra County, where his father was engaged in mining. When he was seven the family moved to a farm in the foothills of Yuba County, and he has been identified with the Sacramento Valley ever since. He taught school for three years and entered the Hastings College of Law in '81, graduating in '84. James D. Phelan was a classmate, but didn't stick it out. During vacations he taught school in Yuba, harvested in Turlock, drove cattle from Modoc and the Pitt River to Sacramento or broke horses in Western Nevada for forty dollars a month, thus proving conclusively that he was no mollycoddle. He clerked for a while in the office of Marcus Rosenthal in this city, but soon after graduating from Hastings went back to Yuba and was promptly elected district attorney, thereby demonstrating his popularity with the county folk. He held the position for four terms and took part in a lot of very important litigation. In the famous hydraulic litigation he won the undying esteem of the farmers by shutting down forty of the mines which were ruining the valley lands. He practiced law for twenty years in all and then plunged into politics, newspapering and bigger enterprises.

Having been born with the fighting spirit, General Forbes plunged into politics on the anti-machine end and waged the battle with variable success. He was chairman of the State convention which tried to instruct delegates against the re-nomination of McKinley; was a candidate for the congressional nomination and lost by one vote to S. D. Wood of Stockton; was a Pardee man at Santa Cruz, and went heart and soul into the Lincoln-Roosevelt League movement. A reformer? Well, if that word had not been so damned by abuse, I would call him a reformer, but it has so many odious associations that in justice to General Forbes I refrain from tagging him. Just about the time that Taft was selected as a candidate for the presidency he bought six newspapers and swung them into line for the big fellow. These papers were the Sacramento Union, the Marysville Appeal, the Marysville Democrat, the Chico Enterprise, the Sterling City News and the Yreka Journal. Later on he sold all but the Marysville Appeal and the Yreka Journal which he still owns. He says he made money with all his papers, but every newspaper proprietor says the same thing.

However, there is no doubt that he has made a lot of money in other enterprises. He was a successful gold dredger. He bought the Marysville and Yuba City street railway. If you happen to know the property you may sniff at its bobtail cars and burros, but General Forbes operated it at a profit and sold it for a handsome price to the Northern Electric Company. He is a stockholder in the Northern Electric and president of the Sutter County Land Company, which does the big land business for the Northern Electric. Do you wonder that he should make a trip around the world?

Just another word about his military career. It is customary for the newspapers to make fun of the non-combatant colonels in our midst. Ambrose Bierce started it when he was writing "Prattle" for the Sunday Examiner, and it has become a habit. But there are colonels and colonels; also there are adjutant-generals and adjutant-generals. General Forbes has always been eager to serve his country as a soldier. He was raised on horseback, has all sorts of gold bars and medals for sharpshooting and would surely distinguish himself in the field if the opportunity came. When he was appointed adjutant-general to succeed Lauck, who was not popular, to put it mildly, a chorus of approval went up from all over the State. Everybody says he is the right man in the right place and I guess he is. I can imagine how he yearns for a try at those insurrectos along the Mexican border from Mexicali to Juarez. But he is working as well as yearning. He has simplified the dress of the National Guard. He has made one dress cap grow where two grew before.

Heney's Swatting of the Founders

By Theodore Bonnet

Sated with victories over grafters, higher-ups, hobgoblins and the like, the Hon. Francis J. Heney has turned his attention to those idols of other days, the Founders of the Republic. At Sacramento last week, Mr. Heney took occasion with characteristic bluntness to dissipate some delusions regarding George Washington and his confreres. Thanks to Mr. Heney, who unsheathed the weapon that lies between his jaws and struck the scales from our eyes, we are now aware that our Revolutionary sires whom we were taught to reverence were tyrants, cheats and impostors. It now appears that the Founders did not, as hitherto we supposed, actualize the dreams of time by introducing on this continent that reign of freedom which the primitive golden ages had faintly forshadowed, which patriots had so long struggled and sighed for in vain, and which the political martyrs of many climes had welcomed in beatific vision. What they did was shameful. They practiced deception on the people. "They gave us the Constitution," says Mr. Heney, "before they ever dared let us know what they had to say about it." And though they affected great love for the people and professed to have confidence in the people, "they pledged themselves that they wouldn't permit the people to know anything about what they had to say. Why? Because the people might not be willing to adopt the Constitution if they understood what it meant."

Mr. Heney was arguing before a committee of the Legislature in favor of the measure to apply the recall to the judiciary, and the point he was making was that the Constitution gave so much power to the courts that if the people had understood it they wouldn't have adopted it. He tells us that the Founders "got up a Constitution in which they did not protect a single right of an individual," also that the Supreme Court "stole the veto power on acts of Congress." He explained that he learned of the duplicity of the Founders from the "Secret Debates" of the Constitutional convention. From these it appears that it was proposed in the Constitutional Convention to give the veto power to the courts, and that the proposal was voted down. "But," exclaimed Mr. Heney in one of his impassioned flights, "we were given a Constitution made up in secret, with no recall back of it, so that they could defy the people." And he added, by way of giving emphasis to the deplorable picture, that England does not give her courts the power to declare an act of Parliament unconstitutional.

All of which is conclusive of the fact that Mr. Heney is a student of Constitutional history, and that he has pursued his studies in the same frame of mind with which he prosecutes men charged with crime. The presumption of guilty Mr. Heney indulges from instinct. He puts confidence in nobody, withholding his suspicion not even from Washington, for George was the presiding officer of the Constitutional Convention. "There is no rule more invariable," said Thoreau, "than that we are paid for our suspicions by finding what we suspect." How well does Mr. Heney exemplify this rule in his conduct! And how utterly does our experience of this virtuous patriot disprove the theory that always to think the worst is the mark of a mean spirit and a base soul!

Mr. Heney's argument at Sacramento was at once a frank exposition of his views, and an impeachment of the men who framed the Constitution. Mr. Heney has impugned their honesty and integrity. And now, not for the purpose of refuting him, but for the purpose of indicating how we came to have other views of the motives of the founders and of the history of the Constitution, I will call attention to some trivial matters which seem to have made no impression on the ornament of the bar and the redeemer of the people's rights.

Mr. Heney has read the "Secret Debates," but he seems not to have read the essays on the Constitution (now known as "The Federalist") which were written in support of the Constitution during the campaign for its adoption. The opening paper on the judiciary, written by Alexander Hamilton, appears to belie much of what Mr. Heney has said. For from this paper it is clear that the power of the courts with reference to the legislative department was a subject of discussion before the Constitution was adopted. If Mr Heney will read this paper he will see why the proposal to give the courts a veto power was voted down in the convention. It was voted down because it was deemed sufficient for the courts to have the power to declare invalid such acts of the Congress as are in conflict with the Constitution. Hamilton explained that the Constitution limits the power of the Congress, prohibiting as it does the passage of bills of attainder, ex post facto laws and the like, and he says: "Limitations of this kind can be preserved in practice in no other way than through the medium of the courts of justice whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the Constitution void." Obviously Alexander Hamilton was practicing no deception on the people. He was for telling them the plain truth. And much of what he said in his essay is of interest today in view of the notion prevalent among great and learned scholars of the Heney type that an act of the Legislature must always be considered an act of the people. Give ear to Hamilton:

"There is no position which depends on clearer principles than that every act of delegated authority contrary to the tenor of the commission under which it is exercised is void. No legislative act, therefore, contrary to the Constitution can be valid. To deny this would be to affirm that the deputy is greater than his principal; that the servant is above his master; that the representatives of the people are superior to the people; that men acting by virtue of powers may do not only what their powers do not authorize, but what they may forbid. * * * It is not to be supposed that the Constitution could intend to enable the representatives of the people to substitute their will for that of their constituents. It is far more natural to suppose that the courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the Legislature in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority. A Constitution is, in fact, and must be regarded by the judges as a fundamental law. It, therefore, belongs to them to ascertain its meaning, as well as the meaning of any particular act proceeding from the legislative body. If there should happen to be any irreconcilable variance between the two that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents."

In this same paper Alexander Hamilton (as though in anticipation of the Heneys of this era), spoke of the importance of an independent judiciary. He said: "The independence of the judges is equally requisite to guard the Constitution and the rights of individuals from the effects of those ill humors which the arts of designing men or the influence of particular conjunctures sometimes disseminate among the people themselves and which though they speedily give place to better information and more deliberate reflection, have a tendency in the meantime to occasion dangerous innovations in the government and serious oppressions of the minor party in the community."

Mr. Heney was somewhat inaccurate when he described the power of the courts to control a legislative act as a veto power. The courts have no veto power. They have jurisdiction only over acts affecting some individual or corporate interest and only when questions arise in actions at law or in equity and in actual litigation. Legislative or executive proceedings which are in their nature political, however they may affect the general welfare and public interest, do not come in contact with personal rights or reach one individual more than another and can not be the subject of litigation. The judicial power can not touch questions of war or peace, the admission or division of states and other questions of the same general character.

As to Mr. Heney's assertion that the Founders did not protect a single right of an individual, this is also somewhat inaccurate. They prohibited the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus except in times of rebellion or invasion. It is true that they did not give full protection to personal liberty, but Mr. Heney is probably the first man who ever harbored the suspicion that the men of the Revoluntion who gave the inspiration and original impulse to our nation, who formed its character and sentiment, and whose sublime thought of freedom was the fruitful germ of our best inward and outward life, were indifferent to the blessings of personal liberty. It has been said that there is nothing that makes a man suspect much, more than to know little. Perhaps this explains Mr. Heney's imputation against the Founders respecting their omissions. Perhaps if he had known of a very plausible and agreeable explanation of their omissions he would not have made the imputation. The explanation of the omission is that the Founders being men of English blood had so strong in their minds the idea of inherited rights under a traditional unwritten constitution that many of the provisions for the protection of personal liberty were at first omitted under the supposition that the assertion of them was unnecessary and might even be prejudicial. The supposition is that it was only upon subsequent consideration that it was fully perceived that the Constitution, if written, must be the whole Constitution, and must therefore be made complete in itself; that the rights of Englishmen under the British government would not follow them into another land after they had thrown off their allegiance unless in some effectual way incorporated into the new institutions which they established And here it may be timely to touch upon Mr. Heney's observation that the English courts have not the power to annul an act of Parliament. Is Mr. Heney not aware that England has a traditional, not a written constitution?

The Diet of a Stenographer

They had quite a debate in the House of Representatives a few days ago on an appropriation to pay for a typewriter bought by a stenographer with her own money for governmental work. The machine, it was shown, had been used for ten years. That fact aroused the curiosity of Congressman James R. Mann, and he delivered himself thus: "Here was a case where they made a request for a typewriter in 1894 for a land office. The Department refused to purchase a typewriter; but the girl wanted the job, and was so anxious to keep the job that she bought the typewriter herself and used it for ten years. How anybody could use a typewriter for ten years is a mystery to me. My stenographer has chewed up a good many typewriters in the course of ten years." The congressman's stenographer must have the capacity of an ostrich.

Holland's Coast Defences

While there is no diminution of concern in France over the course of Holland in fortifying her seacoast, obviously to the advantage of Germany, England has at last wakened up to the seriousness of the issue. Colonel Repington, the military expert of the London Times, has devoted two articles to a broad discussion of the subject. His conclusion is that the fortification of Flushing, closing the navigation of the Scheldt in time of war, answers to no national necessity of Holland, and that in fact it is not on the sea side that Holland is weak, but along her long and practically undefended eastern border. The navigation of the coast is perilous for warships, the shores of the sea afford no landing place for an army, and the 170,000 soldiers of the Netherlands, operating among the canals and waterways of the maritime provinces, could put up an irresistible defence. On the other hand, the German frontier is without defences of any value. It is a temptation to German occupation in case of war. In fact, the writer wonders whether the whole agitation has not been stirred up by Germany to afford an excuse for invasion at the right time. Commenting, the Times says it is the duty of Holland to protect her neutrality on all sides alike, and it is the duty of England to prevent the violation of Belgian neutrality today more than ever before. It is therefore imperative that she should have free access to Antwerp. The Times ends with an appeal to the wisdom of the Dutch government and people to consider the rights of Belgium before entering on a course that may have grave consequences.

Turkey to Borrow From France

When Young Turkey turned her back on France as a source of financial comfort in order to placate Germany she seems to have expected that Berlin and Vienna would vie with each other in begging her acceptance of their surplus cash on long time and easy terms. Her statesmen apparently didn't know that neither capital has any surplus cash to speak of. Anyway, what Germany did was lend the amount urgently required by Turkey, a beggarly $30,000,000, but she lent it with a string to it. The loan is a short time accommodation, and Djavid Bey, the Finance Minister of the Porte, is already wondering how he is to pay it. In this predicament he inclines again to France, and he is said to wonder why he found it impossible to accept last fall the terms which the officials on the Quai d'Orsay exacted as a sine qua non of the listing of a new issue of Turkish bonds on the Bourse. The main condition was that in creating a new Turkish navy and grading up the equipment of the Turkish army the necessary material should be bought in France or from the ally of France, England. Any guaranty to this effect, Djavid Bey and his colleagues then thought, would be a humiliation to Turkey. To give it would be an abandonment of the ideals of the new regime. France couldn't see any advantage in lending her money to be spent in Germany, so the loan was not negotiated. When Djavid Bey, or perhaps his successor, goes back to Paris for the means to pay Germany he will find the same or even more stringent conditions confronting him. It is not believed, however, that he will see any humiliation in them. Turkey must have money, and France is the one country in which she can get it.

The Hell-Roarer on Teddy

General Jacob H. Smith, familiarly known as "Hell-Roaring Jake," has at last made a statement about his military operations in Samar and his resultant troubles. After telling how he was ordered to Samar, Smith continues: "If I would make public the nature of those orders your hair would stand on end. When we got to Ballangiga, in Samar, we found the wounded had been mutilated and burned. I gave instructions to my men to fight the savages to a finish, but to my knowledge not a single woman or child was killed by my soldiers during the campaign. We taught the savages a lesson they needed badly. When I came back to this country I was pictured as a monster. Instead of coming home a hero, as I expected, I was retired two years before my time had expired, by that man Roosevelt, who afterward lauded his friend General Wood to the skies for a similar campaign in the Philippines, except that Wood did not spare anybody of either sex. To my knowledge Theodore Roosevelt has never yet hesitated in sacrificing a friend to further his own ambitions and desires for popularity."

A Swindle Borrowed from Fiction

Paris reports a pearl swindle so near in design to the plot of a short story in a recent American magazine that the inference is irresistible that the Parisian swindler copied the idea. A perfectly dressed man called on a well known Paris jeweler. He wanted a unique pearl. The jeweler had one, but it was expensive—$12,000. The customer asked to see it, and the jeweler suspiciously produced it. "The pearl will do," said the swell stranger, "will you take $10,000? If so, send it to my address." The jeweler, more suspicious than ever, took the pearl round the next morning, on the chance of the buyer being genuine. He was quite determined not to be done, and not to give the pearl up except for cash. The stranger kept the appointment, paid $10,000 cash down, and took the pearl. The jeweler felt sorry he had been suspicious of him. A fortnight later the gentleman called again at the shop. "Could you find me another similar pearl? The one I bought from you I like so well that I want a pair. Of course, I know I shall have to pay more for the second, and I am prepared to give you just double what I gave for the first." The jeweler went pearl hunting, and was lucky enough to find the exact counterpart of the one he had already sold. He wrote to his customer, who called, examined the pearl minutely, and gave it back. "I am awfully sorry to have troubled you, but I can't take it. It won't do, it will not match the one I have well enough.". The jeweler, left with the pearl, for which he had paid $16,000, on his hands, was annoyed and surprised, because, as far as he could see, the second pearl was the exact counterpart of the one he had sold before. He was still more surprised and annoyed on finding out later that it was the same pearl. The man he had bought it of for $16,000, hoping to sell it for $20,000, was a confederate of the original purchaser, and between them the two swindlers had netted $6,000 with an outlay of $10,000, which works out at 60 per cent profit in two weeks.

The Realty Boom in Sacramento

Perhaps it is unfair to speak of the activity which is manifested in Sacramento's realty market as a "boom," for a boom usually rests on an insubstantial basis and lasts but a short time before bringing a crash in its wake, whereas the advance in real estate values which is the most remarkable thing about Sacramento at the present time, has every appearance of being normal. The capital is at last coming into its own; the days are gone, never to return, when it depended on the Legislature for a temporary quickening of business. Steel-ribbed buildings are being erected one after another on sites in the building district which only a short time ago were covered by old-fashioned structures that brought in handsome rentals. There are three structures worthy to be called skyscrapers in course of erection at the present time and more are to be started in the near future. One of the real estate dealers estimates that between six hundred and fifty and seven hundred and fifty families have moved into the Sacramento Valley during the past year. The advance in realty values has been marvelous. A piece of property, eighty feet on L street and one hundred feet on Sixth street, belonging to the Young Men's Institute, has just been sold for $50,500. It was bought six years ago for $6,250. On upper K street a piece of property of fifty-five feet has been sold for $24,000 and a skyscraper will be built upon it. It is part of a lot of one hundred and thirty-five feet by one hundred and sixty which was sold some years ago for $2,000. These are isolated instances, but they show what is happening in Sacramento.

The New Butler

By Alfred Af Hedenstjerna (From the Swedish)

A providence had blessed the house of Bykvist, so that now they were millionaires, although both husband and wife had started as poor little "kids" with broken shoes, and without any absolute certainty as to their daily provender. They had reached an age between fifty and sixty, and had remained free from cancer, chronic dyspepsia, heart disease, or anything else in that line which occasionally hampers the enjoyment of the rich and shadows their sunny existence. The Bykvists fared well and heartily, and they even enjoyed the rare luxury of a good conscience, favorable circumstances having brought them extraordinary riches without demanding extraordinary rascalities on the part of Mr. Bykvist.

They had a fine, capable son, who practically directed the business. They also had two pretty daughters in the early twenties, gentle girls with golden hair, dainty figures, and delicate complexions.

Yet husband and wife were deliberating whether the present standard of their fortunes did not require decisive measures, destined to lift the family once for all above their fellow citizens. Not that they meant to withdraw from their old friends. On the contrary, their triumph was to derive its chief flavor from shining before their circle of acquaintances. Something must be done that could not be imiated by any one in Strandholm.

How about building a palatial mansion? This was already planned, but for obvious reasons the palace could not be completed before three years from date.

How about a Lucullian banquet, with champagne for the cheapest wine, a choice variety of refreshments, and all the vegetables and fruits at least six months ahead of time? No, that had been done on a previous occasion, when one of the guests had gorged herself with new asparagus at Christmas time, without being at all impressed with the fact. The Strandholm gentlemen, moreover, called all brands of wine superior, as soon as they had guzzled a certain amount.

"I know!" said Fru Bykvist at last. She fetched the newspaper and read aloud with a slightly trembling voice:

"A capable man-servant and experienced butler, with excellent references, who has served for eleven years in a baronial castle, desires a position in an aristocratic family. Kindly address Reliable, Esperoed, General Delivery."

"We must have him, John?" said Fru Bykvist.

"Hmm! yes, that would certainly impress the small fry," answered Father Bykvist.

"Oh, how splendid! Of course, he must have a beautiful livery," said the girls.

"He would have plenty of time to assist occasionally in the warehouse," interpolated Bykvist Jr., who had an eye for business.

Half an hour later each member of the family was wielding a pen. The daughters ordered fashion papers with livery patterns, Bykvist Jr. asked for a price list of buttons, gaiters, etc., and the old man himself wrote to "Reliable, Esperoed, General Delivery."

"Heaven grant that he has not already accepted an engagement!" sighed Miss Emmy.

The only one who did not write was Mother Bykvist, who was promenading up and down the avenue with a friend.

"Yes, my dear, there is going to be quite a change in our house very soon," said Fru Bykvist in conclusion.

"You don't say so! How very interesting. Pardon me, but I must hurry home now. Edward is expecting me!" answered the friend, hurrying away as if she had stepped upon a firecracker.

Edward, however, did not get a glimpse of her for the next three hours, for she first peeped into every house in Strandholm to report:

"What do you think? One of the Bykvist girls is engaged to be married! The mother herself hinted as much to me!"

Whereupon a certain ambitious young iron merchant, who loved Miss Emmy better than his life, experienced all the torments of doubt and jealousy, so that he began to dust his revolver case and polish the weapon.

Fortunately "Reliable" was as yet free. His services were available for a paltry five hundred dollars a year.

"No more than our bookkeeper's salary," commented Bykvist Sr.

When "Reliable" arrived at the station and inquired for the home of the millionaire merchant, some Strandholm ladies, who happened to be promenading in the vicinity, nudged each other and whispered: "Just see, will you—that's the father-in-law, who has come to take a look around."

"How peculiar that none of the family is here to meet him?"

"Why, it's to be kept secret for the present, my dear, don't you see?" explained the first speaker.

When the bell rang soon afterward in the Bykvist home, Miss Louise herself went to open the door. Seeing a middle-aged, very well dressed and distinguished looking gentleman, with gray whiskers and a silk top hat, she inquired respectfully for his name.

"Let's not stand on ceremony, little girl! We are going to be comrades, I take it. You just go in and announce that Jousson has arrived," replied "Reliable," chucking the young lady condescendingly under the chin.

"Mamma—Jousson—M. Jousson has come," said Louise excitedly and with some embarrassment, as she opened the door of the parlor.

Fru Bykvist had, it is true, traveled through a few large cities, where she had seen head waiters and lackeys in plenty, whose appearance fully equalled that of any judge or counsellor at law. When, however, "Reliable," alias Jousson, made her a formal obeisance in her own hall, she lost her equanimity altogether, held out her plump hand, and stammered politely: "I bid you welcome, M. Jousson—I mean Jousson. I trust you will make our simple home—our home—I mean."

"Thank you, milady, thank you. When once I understand my duties, I——"

"Yes, indeed—well that is—yes, my husband and myself are not at all hard to please. Everything will be all right if you will begin at once by doing everything just the way it is done in a really aristocratic house. As to your room——"

Miss Louise kept pulling her mother's sleeve so persistently that Fru Bykvist at last followed her into the dining room.

"Mamma, that little closet behind the office is impossible. We must let him have the roon next to papa's."

"I'm afraid you are right. I didn't expect him to be so distinguished looking. Did you hear him address me as milady? That will be the finish of your Aunt Cederlund, and of the Browall set."

It can not be denied that Miss Emmy, as well as Bykvist Sr. himself, also felt somewhat oppressed when they first set eyes on Jousson. The only one not over-awed was the son of the house. He was a child of the modern era, vice-president of several associations, and not so easily dazed.

"These barrels must be taken to the loft before noon," was his short and sharp order, when Jousson accidentally passed the office door.

"Very well, sir," answered Jousson politely, uncovering his head.

At the end of an hour he returned. "Sir?"

"What is it?"

"The barrels have been attended to."

"All right."

"The man who has moved them wants a dollar."

Now this did overwhelm young Bykvist, great, big strong fellow though he was. He gazed in awed surprise at his father's servant, and in some embarrassment paid him a dollar and a silver quarter besides. "Many thanks, sir!"

At the approach of the dinner hour, which had been postponed from two o'clock to half past five, for the sake of appearances, the entire family happened to be assembled in the parlor adjoining the dining room.

"Go to your rooms, girls, and you, John, step into the office, so that Jousson may have a chance to announce dinner."

"But, Martha, my dear, why can not we simply walk into the dining room? I'm hungry as a bear," said Father Bykvist plaintively.

"John, what are you paying five hundred a year for, if you want to sit down to dinner by the clock, like a cobbler?"

When Jousson returned from the girls' rooms, he informed Fru Bykvist with a bow that the young ladies were not yet dressed.

"Were you taking a bath, girls?" asked their mother, when both promptly entered the dining room.

"No, indeed—why do you ask?"

"Jousson said—hmm." The solution suddenly dawned upon Fru Bykvist. Jousson was evidently accustomed to see the ladies dressed for dinner. She almost withered with mortification.

At table, the family looked at each other, ate, chewed, and kept silence. Eleven years of baronial references crushed the small home circle, generally so bright and cheerful, with a heavy and almost annihilating weight. They were so terribly afraid of committing some dreadful mistake!

"I beg your pardon, milady, but I have not yet been entrusted with the key to the wine cellar. Perhaps the maid is to serve the wine today?"

Fru Bykvist range the bell. She was ready to drop under the table. "Bring us some claret, Christina."

"Both bottles, or will one of them do?" answered the maid.

Fru Bykvist felt like crying. Meanwhile Jousson poured the wine with a pained expression in his noble features, as if the grape juice were his own life blood. "I humbly beg your pardon, milady; the temperature of this wine is all wrong. But it shall not happen again."

The table service was indeed admirable of its kind. Hardly had the cakes and preserves been discussed, when Jousson placed a lighted taper before each of the two gentlemen.

"What is he going to do now, mamma?" whispered Emmy, brimfull of respectful curiosity.

"I have no idea, child."

The Smothering of a Bill

Impregnable is the virtue of the rural press, profound its concern for the welfare of the dear people, unappeasable its hatred of grafters and higher-ups—but it must eat. That appetite begets predatory proclivities even in the palladium of our liberties, the following brief history of an act of the Legislature illustrates: On the eighteenth of January Assemblyman Young of the Hadleyburg of California—the township of Berkeley—introduced a bill amendatory of the section of the political code relating to the publication of the delinquent tax list. It provides that the cost of such publication "shall not exceed fifty cents for each lot, piece or tract of land." This bill, I am told, was introduced at the instigation of certain Berkeley reformers who don't like a certain paper published across the bay, which charges one dollar and a half for each description of delinquent property. This paper did not support the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, which accounts for the speed with which the bill was rushed along on its way to the goal between the covers that bind the code. Three days after the first reading it was in type and was referred to committee. In two days it was reported back with the recommendation that it be adopted. On January 26 it was read the second time and was ordered engrossed. The next day it was reported correctly engrossed. Up to that day not one word of opposition to the bill had been uttered. And up to date the newspapers have had nothing to say about it. But the bill has been whispered into oblivion. On January 31 it was re-referred to the Committee on Revenue and Taxation, and there, so the story goes, it will receive its quietus. All of a sudden the bill that had been speeding along with apparently no obstacle in its way was sidetracked, and nary a word said in explanation. What a lesson is this for those who are eager for the recall, the referendum and the other devices by which public servants are to be made to eat out of the hands of the men that operate the great engine of public opinion. That bill has been smothered at the behest of the honest rural press of California. I am told that of the seventy-five papers that published the delinquent tax lists last year, sixty of them supported the men of this Administration, and that all of the sixty charged a higher rate than the rate charged by the paper aimed at by the author of this bill. Naturally the publishers of these papers that preached reform in the last campaign have considerable influence at Sacramento. But far be it from me to suggest that their influence extends to that impeccable statesman, the Governor of the State, who has pledged himself to compel every predatory interest to remove its prehensile fist from the pockets of the taxpayers. It would not astonish me were he to resuscitate the asphyxiated bill and convert in into an Administration measure. A brave and honest man is the Governor—so I've been told.

How the Grafters Operate

There is no uglier form of graft in this State than that by which taxpayers' money is poured into the pockets of greedy publishers who obtain the contract to publish the delinquent tax lists of the several counties at exorbitant prices. The graft is managed by collusion, an illustration of which came to public notice some years ago when the publisher of the Boughten Bulletin, the smug and rectitudinous Mr. Crothers, was exposed by the Post. A corrupt deal had been made by Crothers with the Post under a former management, whereby collusive bids were submitted to the supervisors, the Bulletin's bid being higher than the Post's. In accordance with this deal the Bulletin received a rake-off from its contemporary, but before the expiration of the contract the Post changed hands, and when Mr. Crothers called on the new manager for his share of the swag he was told that the deal was off. It was about that time, I believe, that Mr. Crothers became a reformer and began associating with the good Dr. Rader and other clean and pure clergymen who hate grafters.

Margaret Still Loves Him

Margaret Illington still loves Mr. Edward J. Bowes—and for publication. In Cleveland, where Mrs. Margaret Illington Bowes is appearing this week, she looked up from her darning long enough to tell a newspaper reporter that her feelings for Mr. Bowes are more affectionate than words can tell. "Oh, I should be afraid to tell you just how well I like Mr. Bowes," said Mrs. Bowes, as she caught up a run in the blue lisle sock on which she was laboring. "I should be afraid to tell you how terribly primitive a woman I really am. People wouldn't understand and would laugh, and I'm half sick of it all, the prying and the misunderstanding and the ridicule and everything." Mrs. Margaret Illington Bowes paused long enough to tie a true lover's knot in her darning silk. "And one morning," resumed Mrs. Margaret Illington Bowes, "the Overland Limited took me into Reno. I stayed there many months awaiting my decree. I worked all morning in my vegetable garden while mother talked to me. And in the afternoon I would walk or gallop on horseback way off into the foothills. Mr. Bowes and I were made for each other and ought to have been married—oh, hundreds of years ago. From now on I am going to discuss for publication the stage and legitimate things. I am never going to tell about my dreams. They are mine from now on, just mine." And with a sigh Mrs. Margaret Illington Bowes plucked from her work basket a gray woolen sock which bore a general resemblance to a porous plaster.

To Whoop It Up For Teddy

If one may judge from the complexion of the committee of leading cits. appointed by Governor Johnson to welcome Colonel Roosevelt that "disastrous burden" and "showy charlatan" as Mark Twain has described him will receive a fitting reception on his visit to us in March. The reception will be personally conducted by a congenial crew of our most honest citizens. With one or two exceptions they are all so nearly on a level that none can be said to be conspicuous. Even Mr. Fremont Older, who, in ordinary company glisters like a defunct mackerel in the moonlight softens his spectral fires in this group of highly seasoned patriots which includes P. E. Bowles, a banker as renowned in Oakland as in local financial circles; Charley Bentley, the fruit packer whose company had some misunderstanding with Uncle Sam recently on account of the latter's antipathy for decayed jams; J. J. Dwyer of the memorable Sullivan & Dwyer political combination, later of the Independence Leg and still later of the Spreckels leg; Tommy Hickey of the Public Administrator's crib; Charles Wesley Reed, famous for his mules; F. G. Sanborn, most obedient of the Oliver grand jury who is now quite appropriately a fish commissioner; William Denman of the Graft Prosecution's whitewashing committee, appointed by E. Robson Taylor who still lives in memory; Rudolph himself, arch-angel of the Grand Cabal, and his two attorneys; Matt Sullivan, sometimes attorney for the Boughten Bulletin. But why go on. Suffice that the committee is all but complete. No names missing save those of James Duval Phelan and the Hon. Francis J. Heney. The rift is still in the lute.

Colonel McNear Almost a Hero

It was no deficiency of resolution and no lack of readiness which prevented Colonel E. B. McNear, the brick magnate of Marin County, from proving himself a hero a few days ago. The colonel was "there" but the opportunity was not. I give the story on the authority of the Marin County Tocsin. On the day destined to be fatal to Colonel McNear's hopes of being a hero the whirling tide that eddies and churns between the Brothers Lighthouse and Point San Pedro, bore upon its wave lashed bosom two dark objects which to some fifty laymen appeared like two men battling for life on an upturned skiff. A cry for help went round the point and echoed in the McNear ears. Rushing to the cliff the colonel saw the sight and hurrying back he jumped into the brickyard yawl followed by his chef, his foreman, and his blacksmith. A storm was raging on the bay and the waves lashed and tossed the stout boat until the half hundred souls on shore trembled for the safety of the gallant rescuers. High above the noise of the wind and the crashing waves rose the clear voice of the mighty colonel as every muscle of his lithe body strained with the hand held on his bending oar. "The brickyard expects every man to do his duty. Lay to, boys!" he cried. When the boat had been driven fully a mile out into the troubled waters and the rescue was at hand it was discovered that the things to be rescued were the gnarled roots and body of a cottonwood stump which was being rushed by the current from the river to the sea.

He Sang Before He Died

On the day that Dr. T. A. Rottanzi died at the German Hospital he called his nurse into the room and asked her what was her favorite opera. The question, coming from a man whom the nurse knew to be dying, was surprising, but nurses are used to surprises, so she answered that she loved "Rigoletto" most of all. "You have been very kind to me," said the dying physician, "and I would like to do something in return. Would you like me to sing something from 'Rigoletto'?" The nurse replied in the affirmative, so the doctor raised himself on his pillows and in that beautiful tenor, so familiar to his many friends and in no wise marred by approaching dissolution, he sang "La Donna e Mobile." Then with a smile he dismissed the weeping nurse and when she returned he had passed away.

DeBoozer—"It's warmer today, my dear; I don't think I shall need my overcoat."

Mrs. De B—"You had better take it. You'll find it cold enough tomorrow morning when you are hanging on the palings, as usual, waiting for the keyhole to pass by."

They Can't Understand Him

Notwithstanding the fact that President Benjamin Ide Wheeler has simplified his lectures on American Democracy (originally delivered at the University of Berlin) for local consumption at his own university, I understand that the majority of the large class of undergraduates who are registered in the course are unable to assimilate the doctor's exposition of this very interesting subject. Blank faces and listless fountain pens, I hear, are very common at the Wheeler lectures, the first of any regular course the President has given for years. Whether this state of affairs is caused by a lack of intelligence on the part of the undergraduates, many of whom were enticed to the course because it had been bruited about the campus that the course was to be a "snap," or because of a lack of lucidity on the part of Wheeler, I have been unable to ascertain. The fact remains that there is a great deal of whispering and pleasantry among the underclassmen about the Wheeler lectures. At the conclusion of the first and second lectures they were asking one another "What is he talking about?"—a question which even the large number of duly-registered ladies of "late-in-life" culture seem unable to answer. President Wheeler's lectures have attracted any number of these ladies to California Hall, and a long training in navigating in the rarified atmospheres of sterilized culture has taught them to sit and listen without the quiver of an eyebrow. Many of the collegians, by the way, have decided that the most certain way to win their "prexy's" approbation is to laugh heartily at the jokes which come as oases in the arid wastes of learning and rehashed Teutonisms in which the President is said to be indulging, and to give a vivid pantomime of the exercise of taking notes—one of the least-favored recreations among lovers of "snap" courses.

A Diagnosis of a Howl

Occasionally reformers tread on the toes of reformers and the consequent ululations echo from the empyrean. As for example when one reformer at Sacramento introduced a bill to give the foreign heirs of an estate the right to nominate an administrator. The effect of this bill on little Eustace Cullinan was like a swift and sudden impact at the slack of his trousers. Eustace was off to Sacramento in the morning. Eustace was full to the brim of indignation. Which was to be expected, for was not his meal ticket in jeopardy? Eustace divides with Tommy Hickey and Billy Hynes the emoluments that fall from dead men's estates, and if foreign heirs are to be allowed to look after their own interests there'll be no emoluments. On the face of the bill nothing unreasonable is perceptible. Indeed, to the average disinterested person it might seem that as creditors are allowed to nominate receivers, heirs ought to be allowed to nominate administrators. And to the citizen of decent sensibilities the bill might commend itself inasmuch as it would have the effect of abating the unseemly grabbing of estates by an unnecessary public official. Besides as there has been a great deal of scandal in connection with the office of public administrator, that might appear to be a good reason for limiting the activities of the post-mortem functionary. But on the other hand Eustace and Tommy and Billy must eat, and God forfend! that either of them should be deprived of the comfort of a dead man's leg. However, considering their live connections, there is not much likelihood of the bad reform bill passing. Eustace went to Sacramento to protest, but that was only for appearance sake. The trip wasn't necessary. Eustace and Tommy are Bulletin pets, and they have the Governor's ear.

Matt Wants the Recall

Matt Sullivan went to Sacramento to advocate the application of the recall to the judiciary. Matt is a very ardent reformer of the Boughten Bulletin School. I think I can understand why he is in favor of the recall. His favorite client is the man who has been injured in a railroad accident, and assuming that he does business on the principle on which that particular branch of the law is generally done, his fee is in proportion to the amount of the verdict. In other words, I assume that Matt does business on the contingent fee basis. If he does not, he is exceptional and the assumption in my opinion would do him a very grievous injustice. But merely for the purpose of speculation I assume that all lawyers who cultivate the damage suit practice have a pecuniary interest in their clients' cases. It does not necessarily follow, of course, that they are all akin to what are known in New York as ambulance chasers and half-a-leg lawyers, because the business may be conducted on a dignified basis. The cause of injured men, moreover, may be espoused from sympathy and pity. But whatever the motive the damage suit attorney is very likely to regard the recall as a good thing. For the recall will facilitate matters for all attorneys who have suits against corporations. It will be a great help to all lawyers who claim to represent the plain people. It will be especially advantageous to organized labor, and will be clamored for by all union men who believe that their interests are not identical with the interests of society.

The Genesis of Williams

The appointment of State Treasurer Williams to the bank commissionership is at once a tribute to Chester Rowell of Fresno and a smash at "Weak Brother" Pardee. Mr. Williams hails from Fresno where he was once a drug clerk, qualifying himself at the prescription counter for the banking business. His debut in politics was made at the memorable Santa Cruz convention which, the reformers have repeatedly told us, was the worst that ever happened, the reason being that Pardee wasn't able to trade off public patronage for renomination. Now it happens that Mr. Williams was one of the gentlemen who thwarted the beneficent designs of the great conservationist. The Fresno delegation was traded against Pardee in accordance with a bargain by which Williams received the nomination for State Treasurer. But Mr. Williams is a reformer. He belongs to the faction that has been rolling its eyes in horror at the methods employed to nominate James Gillett for Governor. How instructive and interesting to keep track of the saints in politics and observe the processes by which the affections of the dear people are cultivated and conquested?

A State Anthem

To Assemblyman Bishop of Santa Ana we are indebted for the introduction of a bill which would give us a State anthem. I have not read the bill, so I do not know what penalties are provided for these criminals who refuse to sing the anthem, but I have read the anthem and I know what punishment fits the crime of authorship. Neither by an act of the Legislature nor Constitutional amendment can this effusion with its catalogue of California resources be saved from swift oblivion. As a specimen of boost literature it might serve the purposes of a railroad publicity agent, but as an official lyric it's impossible. It smacks of the Indiana school of poetry. And besides, with all its hungry attention to details of scenery, fruits and flowers, it contains a statement that no proud native son can ever afford to endorse. I allude to the statement that the fame of Shasta and of Yosemite extends latitudinally only from the Sierras to the Sea. This is the songlet:

"CALIFORNIA"

A song to thee of loyalty, a song of the Golden West,
A land that lies 'neath sunlit skies, beside Pacific's breast.
Thy native son and adopted one, from snowy climes, agree
That heaven hath crowned this land renowned —land by the Western sea.

(Refrain)

California fair, California rare, all nature sings to thee,
The balmy breeze, the fragrant trees, the blue of sky and sea.
Mission bells, sweet chimes, as in olden times, and the mocking birds in the vale.
Let the chorus rise to the sunny skies, Eureka California hail.

Thy hills hold wealth, thy breezes health, thy valleys fruits and flowers.
Here the orange bright blends golden light with the poppy pride of ours.
Oh, the lofty heights of Shasta white, Oh, grand Yosemite,
From south to north thy fame goes forth from Sierras to the sea.

(Refrain)

We lowly bend, for heaven doth blend with sunshine, shadows cold;
But God's above this land we love, above the blue and gold.
So here we'll wait till the Golden Gate shall ope when day is done.
Almighty Hand, hold thou our land, "Land of the Setting Sun."

(Refrain)

Caller—Will the cashier be away long?
Office Boy—It depends entirely on the jury.

The Divining Rod in San Berdoo

Up from the parched wastes of San Bernardino comes a story, amazing if true, to the effect that two men, working separately, located the same underground flow of water by means of the divining rod. The two men, it seems, have acquired the reputation of being "water witches" and were called upon to locate the site of a well for the city water department of San Bernardino. With the aid of peach twigs they located several underground streams. Whether their divination will stand the test of digging remains to be seen. But it is claimed for one of the men that he located a well on a ranch near San Berdoo which proved one of the greatest gushers of the countryside. This thing engages the imagination. Who would have thought that rhabdomancy was being practiced seriously in California? I believe the Cornish miners still use it in their native land, though I have never heard of a "Cousin Jack" trying it in any of our mining towns. But in San Berdoo it seems to be very popular, for I learn that one of the diviners there has been engaged on numerous occasions to find water for the thirsty dwellers.

Are They Dousterswivels?

The Germans have a word by which they characterize a swindler who pretends to locate water or anything else by means of the divining rod. They call such a faker a "dousterswivel." The question is, Are the two men of San Berdoo "dousterswivels"? It is a hard name and it will be very difficult to fix upon them the deception which it implies. For the history of the divining rod—and it has a most interesting history—indicates that nothing is more difficult than to decide whether the man who manipulates it is honest or dishonest, whether he is manifesting a phenomenal natural sensibility or whether he is playing a trick. The history of the divining rod goes back to the most ancient times. Cicero laughed at it when he wrote "De Divinatione" and the learned Varro, we are told, wrote a satire on the subject which is lost with the rest of his multitudinous writings, to the grief of scholars and the solid satisfaction of the school boy. Agricola, Sperlingius and Kirchmayer, curious old pundits whose names may be familiar to those who poke in the dusty corners of literature, all wrote at prosy length about the divining rod and took it very seriously indeed. The Jesuit Kircher experimented with it and decided than while it was no good for the detection of mines, treasure, murderers or thieves, it was an efficient instrument for the discovery of subterranean springs and water courses. Other churchmen regarded it as a tool of magic and therefore abominable. But the generality of investigators seem to have leaned to the notion that those who used it were nothing more than "dousterswivels."

MANY a man would be unable to enjoy the healthful exercise of golf if the telephone did not keep him in touch with his business.

A word over the wire saves him an hour's delay in leaving the office. There is another reason.

What the Divining Rod Is

The divining rod, also called the wand of Mercury and the rod of Aaron, is usually a forked branch of hazel, but not always. It may be cut from another tree; then again it may be only a twig, not forked; or it may be a rod of iron, copper or brass. In its usual form it is held by the two prongs in front of the body, the holder's elbows being pressed to his sides while the fingers and thumbs close over the forks. Thus carried it is supposed to indicate by a decided inclination where the hidden water is located. Sometimes it rotates rapidly in the proximity of water. Of this inclination and rotation of the divining rod there can be no doubt; it is substantiated in too many cases, ancient and modern, by reliable authorities. The difficulty is in explaining the phenomenon. Some say it is caused by the contraction and relaxation of the pressure of the hands, due to mental and nervous excitement. Others say that certain men have the sensitiveness of a hydroscope and that the divining rod is merely a means of concentrating their peculiar powers. And others say that the whole thing is poppycock. So there you are. Those who wish to investigate the subject are referred to Baring-Gould's "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages" and to Dr. Herbert Mayo's "On the Truth Contained in Popular Superstitions." In Baring-Gould's book they will read the remarkable stories of the celebrated Jacques Aymar, through whose divination a hunchback was broken on the wheel for a murder committed in Lyons, and of Bleton, the hydroscope. They will find that both men were detected in frauds, but will have a mighty hard time deciding whether all their amazing doings were fraudulent. And they will be interested in knowing that if the two men of San Berdoo have actually discovered water, California has added a chapter to the history of a curious subject.

"We won't print any such stuff as that!" said the editor loftily as he handed back the manuscript

"Well, you needn't be so haughty about it," retorted the irregular contributor. "You're not the only one who won't print it."

Paying for Society Scandal

London, says one of my correspondents, is very much shocked to learn through the columns of the Thunderer that a woman correspondent of certain American newspapers has been bribing butlers and footmen at fashionable houses to furnish her with such English society scandal as they could overhear at dinner tables. No wonder London is shocked. It causes uneasiness to suspect that the servant who brings in the soup carries out of the dining room the story of your tiff with your wife and sells it to a newspaper woman for American consumption. You don't like to feel that the footman who takes your card has retailed the story of your latest liaison. It is not only embarrassing but saddening, for it reveals a depth of wickedness in the servant which you did not suspect. As to the newspaper woman who subsidizes the servants, she deserves severe censure. But no doubt she defends herself by saying, "I must eat."

Mrs. Carolan's Latest Distinction

Mrs. Francis J. Carolan's prolonged visit in Paris has not been in vain. This distinguished Blingumite who is going to establish a salon in San Francisco on her return, has been mingling with the highest highbrows in the French capital and has capped all her other achievements by obtaining membership in the Societe des Amis du Livre Moderne. You never heard of it? Shocking! Not to know the Societe des Amis du Livre Moderne argues oneself unknown. In its list of members are included the Duchesse de Rohan, the Marquise de Clermont-Tonnerre, the Comtesse de Fels, the Duchesse de Guiche, James de Rothschild, Jules Claretie and Henry Houssaye of the French Academy, Comte Stanislas de Casteja, Comte Foy, Comte Robert de Montesquiou and other esthetes. As far as I know only Mr. W. R. K. Young and Mrs. Carolan represent San Francisco while the rest of the United States has contributed one Indiana man and one Philadelphia man to the roll of membership. Truly our social leader is moving in a rarefied atmosphere of culture. But I suppose that for the benefit of my benighted readers I must tell what the Societe des Amis du Livre Moderne is for. It is a society organized to publish three books which are expected to be the dernier cri in de luxe bookmaking. The first volume was a history of modern bookmaking, the second is Maeterlinck's "La Vie des Abeilles" and the third has not yet been determined on. No doubt Mrs. Carolan will have a voice in selecting it. I have seen the de luxe Maeterlinck "imprime pour Mrs. Francis J. Carolan," for it is on exhibition at Newbegin's book shop in Sutter street. I have also seen the bronze plaquette which is the visible sign of Mrs. Carolan's membership in the society.

Will Mrs. Carolan Read It?

What old bibliopole was it who said that people who buy de luxe books never read them? I hesitate to apply his cynical aphorism to Mrs. Carolan. For there can be no doubt that in her rather brief career as a culturist—or shall I say a highbrow?—Mrs. Carolan has gone a long distance. If she had not, would she ever have attained membership in the Societe des Amis du Livre Moderne? By some it may be objected that this is a society for the buying and not for the reading of books, but of course we must first buy books before we can read them, must we not? Either that or join a library, and I cannot imagine Mrs. Carolan reading a library book grimed by somebody's "observant thumb." I prefer to let my imagination luxuriate in the vision of Mrs. Carolan reclining in her boudoir and drinking in the beauties of "La Vie des Abeilles." I refer not only to the beauties of Maeterlinck's style but to the beauties of craftsmanship displayed in this de luxe volume. Can you not see her gloating over the wonderful workmanship of the famous Meunier who designed and bound the volume, drinking in the exquisite art of the illustrations by Schwabe, illustrations that have gone through the color press as many as ten times? These are pleasant imaginings. Perhaps Mrs. Carolan may make of them realities—if she is not too busy with her social duties—or if she is interested in Maeterlinck and bees.

A Diminished Wedding Party

It was at first intended that the attendants at the wedding of Templeton Crocker and Miss Helene Irwin should include Mrs. Richard Hammond as matron of honor, Miss Julia Langhorne, Miss Elizabeth Newhall, Miss Marian Zeile, Miss Mary Keeney, Miss Marian Newhall and Miss Jennie Crocker. Several misfortunes have necessitated the curtailment of this plan. Mrs. Hammond has withdrawn on account of the death of her husband and Miss Julia Langhorne, the sister of Mrs. Hammond for the same reason. Miss Keeney withdrew on account of the death of her grandmother Mrs. Pratt. Miss Elizabeth Newhall has become a bride. Miss Marian Zeile withdrew when her father died but has since consented to take part. So only Miss Zeile, Miss Marian Newhall and Miss Crocker remain of the original party. And in the meantime Templeton Crocker is going about with his arm in a sling, having broken it while cranking his machine.

How Burton Harrison Voted

There has been considerable comment about town on the fact that Francis Burton Harrison, congressman from New York, voted for New Orleans in the exposition contest. Harrison has been severely criticized for this action, and, in my opinion, with good reason. For Congressman Burton Harrison should feel particularly grateful to San Francisco and should have showed his gratitude by favoring San Francisco as the place for the fair. Burton Harrison married Mary Crocker, one of San Francisco's greatest heiresses, and when she died he inherited the bulk of her immense wealth. He is sharing the enjoyment of that wealth today with the woman he married in hot haste after his first wife's death in an automobile accident and who, it was said, long before her marriage was wearing some of Mary Crocker's emeralds. There was great indignation over this among the friends of the Crockers. In politics Harrison is known as a reformer.

bride that she was about to give a luncheon and that she was at a good deal of a loss what to do, as she did not possess enough silver for the number of guests she wanted to invite. The bride immediately came to her assistance. "I've got loads of silver," she said, "and will gladly lend you whatever you want." The offer was gratefully accepted. The luncheon was given and everybody voted it a charming affair. The bride was present. As she left the table she astounded her hostess and all the other guests by emptying the salt cellars on the table cloth and saying very coolly: "I'll take these home in my purse. My chauffeur will call for the larger pieces you borrowed."

Infantile Maladies in the Smart Set

The bavardes caused some concern among friends of the Charles Stetson Wheelers this week when they announced that Mrs. Wheeler and her daughter Elizabeth had taken "permanent" apartments at the Bellevue. Gossips speculated and the telephones were busy. At the Wheeler home in Jackson street it was stated that the house was not closed. The second daughter in the family has whooping cough and it was deemed advisable to remove a younger sister from the danger of infection. With her mother she is at the Bellevue while the invalid is in semi-quarantine at the Wheeler home. The family expects to leave in May for New York to attend the graduation of Miss Lillias Wheeler from Vassar and they will spend the summer in Europe. "The Bend," their country home on McCloud River, will remain closed this year. Mrs. Peter Martin has been suffering from another infantile malady. An attack of chicken-pox which she contracted from her son, Charles Oelrichs Martin, kept her housed for ten days but she is out again. Mrs. Peter is to take her departure this week for New York where she will visit her parents and later her sister, Mrs. Thomas, at Newport.

They Were Not Prominent Enough

A certain matron who recently moved into a very beautiful home in the Western Addition has been giving a series of bridge parties. One day last week a society reporter on one of the papers rang her up and asked for the details of one of these affairs. The hostess was very gracious and supplied a list of the guests which included a number of well known ladies, described the decorative scheme, the prizes, etc., and ended by stating that she intended to give another bridge party on the same day in the following week. So the reporter rang her up again this week and asked for the particulars of the more recent affair. Judge of her surprise when she received this reply: "I do not care to give you the list of my guests this week. They are not sufficiently prominent to publish."

A Clocked Stocking

It is whispered that Oakland society women have taken up a new fad which has been in vogue in London and before that in Paris. Evidence has been hard to secure because of the delicacy of the subject, but at that there be those who make positive statements in the matter. It is said that some of the ultra fashionables of the elite of the Athenian city now wear an ankle band which encloses a small clock, or watch. As yet the idea has not gained a strong foothold but if it should it would appear as if many stockings would be watched.

The Whereabouts of Cornelia and Lily

Mrs. Cornelia Baxter Tevis (McKee) who has dropped the McKee from her name is enjoying the social whirl at Knoxville, Tennessee. Her return from Paris was quietly made and she went from New York to her relatives, Governor and Mrs. George Baxter of Tennessee at whose gubernatorial residence she is now a guest. In New York she stayed with Miss Lily Lawlor who has been her loyal friend since the McKee divorce. Miss Lawlor, by the way, has an apartment in New York this winter where she entertains musical and literary celebrities at a weekly salon. Her voice is said to be more vibrant and rich than ever and her hair retains the Titian splendor. Miss Lawlor is a stunning looking woman who had the reputation of being the most popular bachelor-girl in the American colony of Paris a few years ago.

Young Hammond's Death

The death of young Richard Hammond was a great shock to his family and friends although his health had necessitated living in the dry altitudes of Colorado and Arizona for several years. He was a promising young man, the elder son of the A. B. Hammonds. Deep sympathy is extended the young widow who was Maizie Langhorne, sister of the popular Julia Langhorne. She was to have come from her Colorado home to be matron of honor at the Irwin-Crocker wedding but her husband's physicians advised a return to Arizona in the hope of prolonging his life and she accompanied him. He died in Tucson last Monday. Leonard Hammond, the second son of the family, married Ruth Merrill, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John F. Merrill and sister of Mrs. Harry Sears Bates.

Winter Recreation

One of the most favored recreations among some of the ultra fashionable Piedmont matrons these winter days is posing for their portraits in the studios of clever artists who make their homes in the Piedmont hills. Xavier Martinez is one of the artists who makes his home in the exclusive hillside community, while Dick Partington is another. Partington has lately done a number of stunning canvases quite suggestive of Sargent. Mrs. Frank C. Havens, Miss Amy Bowles, the charming daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Phillip Bowles, and Mrs. Edward C. Engs are among those whose charms he has transferred to canvas. Another stunning portrait in the Partington studio is that of Mrs. "Wick" Havens. Partington is painting now in a vigorous and fresh manner, and has succeeded in pleasing his sitters with faithful and lifelike portraits. Martinez also has painted several maids of the Piedmont smart set, and the canvases are promised an early exhibition.

They Are Honeymooning Here

Mrs. F. W. Devereux who is at the Palace with her husband to whom she was married in Portland last week was formerly the wife of Chauncey Rose Winslow of San Francisco. She was Alice Libson, a belle of the Northern city, and married Winslow a year or two after his divorce from Mrs. Sallie Stetson Winslow, daughter of the late J. B. Stetson. He died a few months later in Europe and the young bride returned to her parent's home where her wedding to Devereux, who is a New Yorker, took place. They are to continue their honeymoon trip to Coronado. The first Mrs. Winslow makes her home with her sister, Mrs. Robert Oxnard.

Martin Merle's College Play

By Edward F. O'Day

I have read with considerable interest what the critics of the morning papers had to say about the first presentation on any stage of "The Fullback," a college play by Martin V. Merle of this city. It seems to me that these critics, while hurrying from the Alcazar to their newspaper offices, must have encouraged a state of mind in which severity was unduly prominent. I am inclined to think that they went a great deal too strong. What a savage sound their banging typewriters must have given forth as they battered away at the playwright's defenses! How grim their countenances must have been as they completed the damnation of his effort! I can almost fancy them quoting softly, with considerable self-satisfaction: "Down, down to Hell, and say I sent thee thither!" Is it not possible that their overstrained scrupulosity obscured their sense of justice? In their well-intentioned zeal to give the public to the very last iota their expert judgment of Merle's attempt did they not forget that the author was entitled to a certain amount of consideration which would in no wise have infringed the rights of theatergoers? Let us admit for the sake of argument that Merle offended against the rules of dramatic writing. Is it not his first offense? And should he not receive the mercy which justice bestows on first offenders? Was it necessary to condemn him in terms calculated to bring upon him the blight of discouragement? For one I do not see the necessity. Before "The Fullback" was produced it was announced that Merle had made arrangements to have it presented in the East under the management of Selwyn and Company and that it was to be given at the Alcazar in advance of the eastern production simply because the author was a native San Franciscan. "The Fullback," therefore, was passed upon by Selwyn and Company and by the Alcazar management. Now I am willing to admit that the producers of plays are more frequently at fault in their judgments than the critics of plays. That is inevitable, because plays are never completed until the curtain rises for their first presentation and perhaps the critics would be no more infallible than the managers if they had to pass upon them in manuscript or in rehearsal. But when a play receives the approval of two such experienced concerns as Selwyn and Company and the Alcazar, may we not infer that it is not hopelessly bad? Merle's play is very far from being hopeless. Its principal defect springs from its author's inexperience. Merle is a young man in years, a very young man in dramaturgic experience. His pen is still experimenting. He has not found himself. Call it modesty, call it diffidence it you will; but there is visible in his work a quality which quells his inclination to be original. He is learning his craft by imitating others, an excellent method that is recommended by teachers of all the arts. Being a college man he knows the college life, he senses the college atmosphere, he understands college romance. But when he undertook to write a college play he was hampered by his knowledge of other college plays; he lacked the experience in playwriting which would have enabled him to steer clear of the beaten track and open up a new way for others to follow in. College debts, college yells, college frats, colleges loves, college freaks of both genders and college football games are very real things, very interesting things. Merle probably knows as well as the rest of us that they are not the whole of college life. There are bigger and more difficult things in college life, things worthy the pen of an Ibsen or a Hauptmann, things which only a Wedekind would have the courage to put into a Kraft-Ebing sort of drama. Those who have not been at college may know some of these things from "Pendennis" and "Tom Brown at Oxford" and the darker pages of Mrs. Voynich's "Jack Raymond." Some day Martin Merle may see fit to put some of these things into a college play; but he will not be able to do it for several years. He must win his spurs by pedestrian exercises, like the squires of old, before he mounts for more serious work. "The Fullback" is part of the pedestrian process and therefore should not be criticised as the fruitage of a ripened workmanship would deserve to be criticised. Let us remember—parva componere magnis—that Shakespeare wrote the impossible "Titus Andronicus" and still lived to achieve some little success with later efforts; let us recall Moliere's, Sardou's, Wilde's immature gropings for dramatic expression. And then let us ask ourselves whether it is necessary to blast youthful enthusiasm with heavy-handed excoriation. Merle should forget what the critics have said about "The Fullback" and set about improving it, for it is worth working on and there is no reason why he should not round it into very acceptable shape. Let him remember how it was received on the first night at the Alcazar. The audience liked it and at the end of the second act applauded so vociferously that the author had to appear before the curtain and express his appreciation. If Merle has been chilled by the cold blasts of the critics, let him warm himself at the genial fire of that first night's ovation and tackle his work with renewed vigor and undiminished enthusiasm. Let him recollect that Byron had an experience just as unpleasant as his and found the courage to say:

"As soon
Seeks roses in December,—ice in June;
Hope constancy in wind, or corn in chaff,
Believe a woman, or an epitaph,
Or any other thing that's false, before
You trust in critics."

"The Arcadians" at the Columbia

"The Arcadians," a musical comedy in three acts, with the promise of sprightly dancers, satisfying ensembles, lilting music and clever dialogue will be offered for an engagement of two weeks at the Columbia beginning Monday night. "The Arcadians" enjoyed over two seasons' run in New York and is now in its third year in London. It will be presented by the same company that was seen at the New York Theatre this season. Of the musical numbers some of the most popular are "Pipes Pan," "Bring Me a Rose," "Arcady," "The Girl with the Brogue," "My Motter," "Joy of Life," "I Like London," "Picadilly," "Somewhere," "Charming Weather," and "Back Your Fancy." Charles Frohman is standing sponsor for the production and care is given to every detail.

SCENE FROM THE FANTASTIC MUSICAL COMEDY "THE ARCADIANS" AT THE COLUMBIA THEATER

Stage

James T. Powers in "Havana"

During the past season the Savoy has provided the town with a great deal of wholesome food for laughter, but not since De Wolfe Hopper was with us have we had any comedian so expert in tickling the risibles as James T. Powers who has been playing this week in "Havana." Powers is an irresistible comedian of the most approved up-to-date sort, a rapid-fire funmaker who is never content unless the audience banishes every trace of seriousness in his presence. In "Havana" Powers has a happy medium for eliciting guffaws and giggles. The book of this musical play has passed through several hands. George Grossmith and Graham Hill, two English librettists of considerable distinction, were originally responsible for it, but it was "Americanized" for the New York production, and received its final touches from Powers himself. That was a good thing. Powers knows what he wants and also knows what his audiences want. The book in its present form suits the comedian to a "T." As for the music, it is the work of Leslie Stuart, who awoke one morning to find himself famous as the author of "Floradora." It is all very soothing to the ear and if it is in many places reminiscent of what Stuart has done before there is nobody to complain. The lyrics, which are from the pens of Adrian Ross and George Arthurs, are delightful. Of patricular charm are the pretty "On the Shores of Sheepshead Bay" and the topical "How Did the Bird Know That?" Of course, the "Hello, People," which reached across the continent just as soon as it was sung on Broadway, was bound to be received with acclaim and it certainly gains by the fascinating manner in which it is presented. Miss Geraldine Malone in the role of Anita scores a success which can not but be gratifying to her many friends in this city. It is quite a while since she has been in San Francisco and she comes back a very finished player. Another young woman who has local fame is Miss Helen Darling; she, too, acquits herself in fine fashion. The rest of the cast is of a high standard and the show girls are peaches. —The Second Nighter.

Josef Hofmann, Piano Virtuoso

The sale of seats for the three concerts to be given by the master-pianist Josef Hofmann, the true successor of the great Rubenstein, will open next Wednesday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s The opening concert will be given at the Columbia on Sunday afternoon, January 19. On this occasion the artist will play a group of four or five Beethoven numbers, a group of Chopin works and a group of six of the masterpieces of the modern Russian composers including Scriabine, Gabrilowitsch, Liadow, Rubenstein and Tschaikowsky. The only evening concert will be given on Thursday night, February 23, at Christian Science Hall when a program devoted exclusively to Schumann, Chopin and Liszt will be the attraction. A special program will be arranged for the farewell concert at the Columbia on Sunday afternoon, February 26.

"The Pit" at the Alcazar

"The Pit," a dramatization of the late Frank Norris' story, is announced as the Alcazar's offering throughout the coming week, with Bertram Lytell as Curtis Jadwin, the role in which he scored his first emphatic success in the Sutter street playhouse, and Evelyn Vaughan also favorably placed in the cast. All the splendid strength of the book is brought out in Channing Pollock's adaptation. There are five acts and each of them demands an elaborate and artistic setting. During the progress of the play Evelyn Vaughan becomes the wife of Jadwin and Bessie Barriscale will be seen as her younger sister, Viola Leech as the daughter of Jadwin's partner, Adele Belgarde as a broker's wife and Will R. Walling, Howard Hickman, Louis Bennison, Burt Wesner, Charles Gunn and all the other male principals as typical stock brokers. There are fifty-two speaking characters and more than that number of supernumeraries.

JAMES T. POWERS

The favorite comedian who is making such a hit in "Havana" at the Savoy Theater.

Another Week of "Havana"

"Havana" will begin its second and last week in San Francisco at the Savoy this Sunday evening. "The Midnight Sons," Lew Fields' big musical production, with George W. Monroe and an immense cast, will begin a limited engagement at the Savoy Sunday evening, February 19.

Pepito Arriola's Farewell

Pepito Arriola, the Spanish boy pianist who has been the sensation of the musical season, will give his farewell concert this Saturday afternoon at Christian Science Hall and will play a stupendous program, including Beethoven's "Sonata Apossionata," two Chopin works, Scriabine's "Prelude and Nocturne" for left hand alone, Rubenstein's "Valse Caprice" and other works including a group of three Liszt masterpieces.

English Beauty at the Orpheum

Miss Fannie Ward, the famous English beauty who will appear next week at the Orpheum, is one of the most popular of the younger actresses on the British stage and a great favorite in the most exclusive social set in London. For eighteen months she appeared in one play in that city and his late Majesty King Edward and Her Majesty Queen Alexandra went to see her five times. For four years in succession she won the annual prize for the best dressed woman in London. All her gowns are designed by Lady Duff Gordon, the foremost modiste in the world. Miss Ward is the widow of Sam Lewis, the famous London multimillionaire, and she is the possessor of a mansion in Berkeley Square and a country estate adjoining that of William Waldorf Astor. Her jewels are celebrated throughout Europe. Miss Ward's contribution will consist of a sketch of originality and brilliancy called "An Unlucky Star" which has been specially written for her and in which she will have the support of a company of metropolitan players. Mignonette Kokin is always a welcome visitor to this city. Her impersonations of comediennes of foreign lands are clever and diverting. Redford and Winchester are two very clever eccentric jugglers. They appear with Galetti's Simian Circus. Porter J. White will return for one week and present his thrilling one-act sketch "The Visitor" in which he recently scored such a great hit. Next week concludes the engagements of Amy Butler and Her Big Quartette, The Reed Brothers and Frank Tinney.

Alessandro Bonci, Tenor

When the assertion is made that Bonci is the greatest living tenor, the question is immediately asked, "What is the matter with Caruso?" The latter has unquestionably the most powerful, the biggest and perhaps the most beautiful tenor voice in existence, but in the art of singing, the true Italian art of "bel canto," Bonci stands alone His voice is of a different quality from Caruso's, being of the lyric or coloratura style, a type that is rapidly disappearing for the simple reason that the demand for tenors is so great that those found to possess this quality of voice are tempted to appear in public without sufficient time for study. It takes many years to cultivate the voice as Bonci has and his work will be a revelation to our music lovers. Will Greenbaum is paying Bonci a very large fee to appear twice in this city, and the artist promises two exceptional programs at the Columbia on Sunday afternoons, March 5 and 12. Mail orders for these two events may now be sent to Mr. Greenbaum and will receive prompt attention.

Ye Liberty Offers "The White Sister"

Another of the recent notable dramatic successes will be offered the patrons of Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, next Monday evening when the stock players will be presented in "The White Sister," F. Marion Crawford's last and best play. It will be recalled as the piece in which Viola Allen, James O'Neill and other prominent players scored such a success here last fall. Manager Bishop is planning an excellent production of the play. Muriel Hope and Sydney Ayres will have the leading roles and Henry Shumer is to be seen as the Monsignore in which part O'Neill appeared originally. There are enough other strong acting parts to allow all the favorites to be seen to almost equal advantage. Three elaborate stage settings will be shown, all of which have been specially prepared. "Quincy Adams Sawyer" will be Ye Liberty's attraction for Washington's Birthday week.

SAN FRANCISCO

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—After a continuous rise for a week the stock market has entered a period of readjustment, speculatively speaking. There has been sufficient good selling of the leading issues and without further bull impetus by banking syndicates a moderate recession of a point from the high figures now seems in order. There still remains some timidity on the part of the important interests as regards the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific merger decisions which are likely to be handed down the first part of any week now, and this seems to be the chief factor in depressing stocks. Other than this we see no change in the situation and after moderate recessions we look for higher prices as the result of increased railway rates.

Wheat—Virtually no progress in decreasing the available supply of wheat in this country or the world has been made in the last week. New crop grain from Argentine and Australia has been coming into commercial channels at a lively rate and although there was some decrease in the primary receipts in this country they were large enough to keep commercial supplies on the increase. On account of severe weather and ice blocades to shipping the Russian and Danubian shipments for the last week will fall behind the recent showing, but the trade is aware that this relief, if such it is, is but temporary. Prospects are that the official visible supply statement will show an increase in this country for the last week, and there is conviction in grain offices the world over that the world has an oversupply insofar as the present crop year is concerned.

Corn—The bare fact that corn prices are hovering around the export level has given that grain a much better status than wheat. The United States seems destined to supply about all of the European demand for corn. The item of exports, however, is a small one as compared to the total quantity that never crosses the county line in which it is grown. Nevertheless, along with the Argentine crop scare the export demand has been timely in keeping commercial supplies from piling up. Indications now are that European wants have been so largely supplied for the present that the foreign buyer can hereafter depend on "job lot" prices and sales to replenish his wants.

Cotton—The deadlock which has existed for several months past in the market for futures was partially broken during the week by a marked change for the worse in the European trade situation and values declined substantially for the active options. There is a general feeling that Liverpool has overestimated Manchester's requirements and has taken considerable cotton on speculation against prospective future business. This view would seem justified by the fact that while exports of cotton goods from Great Britain for the last quarter of 1910 amounted to only 351,671,000 pounds against 331,899,000 for the same quarter in 1909, imports of cotton for the season thus far amount to 1,057,500 bales in excess of this date last season. This leaves the Liverpool stock and afloat 4,419,000 against only 1,103,000 bales a year ago. With the possible exception of Texas where sufficient time yet remains to receive the necessary moisture to permit planting, conditions throughout the cotton belt are more favorable for planting a larger crop than for many years. Farmers have commenced hauling a month sooner than usual and a material increase in the amount used is reported.

Heney's Swatting of Founders

I have said nothing about Mr. Heney's argument in favor of the recall because I find that it is quite logical. It is based on the proposition that in the representative form of government all agents are supposed to carry out the will of the people without regard to their own judgment or their own conscience. This is practically what he said at Sacramento. And it is probably the first time such a proposition was ever set forth by a man reputed to be as wise as Mr. Heney. I have always understood that in a representative government the people presumably select for their agents the ablest men that can be found and allow them to exercise their knowledge for the good of the people under the check of the freest discussion and the most unreserved censure and with the least possible direct interference of their constituents. If this idea is wrong, then Mr. Heney is right, and a representative government means the absolutism of the majority; and the only objection to be urged against the recall of the judiciary is that it presupposes law and judges. Now when the will of the majority is absolute it is like comic opera to have law and judges.

Slow Enough

Old Bill Titcomb has taken a sack of grain to an old-fashioned mill to have it ground into meal He watched the ponderous wheels revolving slowly while a tiny stream of meal trickled feebly out. Finally his patience became exhausted.

"Do you know," he said, "I cud eat that there meal faster than yer durned mill can grind it!"

"Yes?" remarked the miller, "but how long could you keep on eating it, Mr. Titcomb?"

"Wal," replied Old Bill, conclusively, " I reckon I cud keep on at that rate till I starved."

"Presumably, we are to smoke," Bykvist Jr. informed his sister, for he had seen a little more of the world than the rest of his family.

This proved to be the case. Fortunately there was a box of cigarettes in Father Bykvist's room, else there would have been another source of mortification. When the family at last arose, the joys of the table were found to have consumed exactly an hour and three-quarters. The maid Christina had usually managed to supply their needs in considerably less time.

Ostentatiously, though noiselessly, Jousson threw open the folding doors to the parlor and withdrew humbly behind the sideboard, where he stationed himself like a show horse on parade. They all felt that something was expected of them, without knowing what to do.. Bykvist Sr. politely offered his arm to his wife, and solemnly led her into the parlor, fondly hoping that he was living up to Jousson's expectations.

When coffee had been served, the old man invited a few friends over the telephone to a small impromptu card party—just enough to fill two tables, for there was a dearth of "swell" gentlemen in Strandholm.

"He is going to introduce us to the new father-in-law," said the invited guests. When they arrived and entered the parlor, they did not find any father-in-law, however. What they did see, through the door leading into the room of the master of the house, was a stately old gentleman, who was arranging the card tables with serious dignity.

"The new relative is making himself at home," whispered the guests as they nudged each other. "He does look confoundedly aristocratic."

As they came into the room to draw lots for their places at the tables, the strange gentleman busied himself unconcernedly at the sideboard with a tray of punch glasses, as if the company did not interest him in the least. All the guests stopped at the door, looking reproachfully at Bykvist, and asked him in a half whisper: "Introduce us—why don't you?"

"Some more soda water, Jousson!" ordered Bykvist briskly; and as the butler walked off, and the others gazed at the host in speechless surprise, he added nonchalantly: "That's the new manservant I have engaged. Those confounded servant girls have almost killed me with their slovenliness."

Everything went off well, until the very strong and expensive cognac took its effect, and master-tanner Barkhom began to use more forceful than elegant language over his bad luck at cards. At the uncouth words Jousson shuddered as at a serpent's bite, and looked so imploringly at his master that they all felt ashamed of themselves.

At supper the doctor waxed wroth when the attentive Jousson placed three clean forks beside him, having seen him indiscriminately thrust the same fork he was using to eat with into all the side dishes and preserve jars upon the table, in deference to a time-honored custom of the simple life.

Meanwhile, poor Christina sat in the kitchen shedding bitter tears, because she was no longer entrusted with waiting on the table.

Fru Bykvist's face fell when Jousson asked her for the finger bowls. And when the beer made its appearance in crystal pitchers, so that it was impossible to distinguish the brew, the railroad inspector said pointblank: "Look here, Bykvist, what do your mean by all this tomfoolery?"

None of the guests enjoyed themselves at the Bykvists' upon that occasion as they were in the habit of doing; although certainly no one could find fault with the service. On the following day, Jousson, alias "Reliable," alias Bykvist's father-in-law, took his departure by the noonday train, with a fair sum in his pocket to indemnify him for the position he had lost.

"Do you think women would vote for the best man?" "Certainly; the bridegroom wouldn't be noticed at all."

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—Dept. 10, Probate, No. 4877.

In the Matter of the Estate of JOHN SKEEHAN, Deceased.

It appearing to this Court from the verified petition of Louis Jurgens, administrator of the above entitled estate, that a sale of the real property of the estate of said John Skeehan, deceased, is necessary to pay the debts outstanding against the said decedent, and the debts, expenses and charges of administration, and further, that it would be to the advantage, benefit and best interests of the estate, and those interested therein, to sell the real property belonging to said estate;

It is hereby ordered that all parties interested in the estate of John Skeehan, deceased, be and they are hereby directed to appear before this Court in the Courtroom of Department 10 thereof, in the Grant Building, the Southeast corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, at the hour of 10 A. M. on the 15th day of February, 1911, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted for the sale of the real property belonging to the estate of decedent, John Skeehan, or in which the said John Skeehan had any interest at either public or private sale.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published in the "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE ON APPLICATION FOR LEAVE TO MORTGAGE REAL PROPERTY

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 8131, Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of THERESA J. O'CONNOR, Deceased.

Annie L. Jones, the Administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Theresa J. O'Connor, deceased, having filed herein her duly verified petition praying for an order of this Court authorizing and directing her to borrow the sum of Six Hundred Dollars ($600.00) or such lesser sum as the Court may deem necessary wherewith to pay the debts of said estate, and to make the necessary improvements thereon, as set forth in said petition on file herein, and for the purpose of securing the re-payment of such loan to mortgage to the lender of such money certain real property of said estate situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Church Street, distant two hundred and twenty-seven feet northerly from the northerly line of 24th Street; thence northerly along said line of Church Street thirty-three (33) feet; thence at right angles easterly one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet; thence at right angles southerly thirty-three (33) feet; thence at right angles westerly one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet to the point of commencement. Being a portion of Horner's Addition Block No. 64.

It is therefore ordered, that all persons interested in said estate appear at this Court in Courtroom of Department No. 10 of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, at the Grant Building, Seventh and Market Streets, on the 27th day of February, 1911, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, then and there to show cause why said prayer of said petition should not be granted and the real property within described mortgaged to secure a loan to said estate for Six Hundred Dollars ($600.00), or such lesser amount as the Court shall deem meet, and

It is ordered that notice of the time appointed for hearing said petition, and the Order to Show Cause, be published for four successive weeks in the "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation, published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

For further particulars in said petition you are hereby referred to said Petition now on file herein, which said petition is made a part hereto.

SEBASTIANO CICERONE, also known as A. Sebastiano Cicerone, Plaintiff, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Sebastiano Cicerone, also known as A. Sebastiano Cicerone, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Lafayette Place, distant thereon ninety-seven (97) feet and six (6) inches northerly from the northerly line of Green Street; running thence northerly along said line of Lafayette Place fifty-nine (59) feet; thence at right angles easterly fifty-seven (57) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles southerly fifty-nine (59) feet; and thence at right angles westerly fifty-seven (57) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement; being a portion of Fifty (50) Vara Lot Number Three Hundred and Seventy-six (No. 376).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

ORDER DIRECTING NOTICE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—No. 10350. Dept. No. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of LUCINDA POINDEXTER, Deceased.

AXEL E. BERN, having presented to this Court and filed herein his duly verified petition, claiming to be entitled to a conveyance from Mary S. Merrill, as the executor of the estate of Lucinda Poindexter, deceased, of that certain real property described as Lots 7 and 8 in Block 2, Laymance Subdivision of Warner Tract, in Brooklyn Township, Alameda County, California; and it appearing to this Court that said Lucinda Poindexter in her lifetime entered into a written contract with the said Axel E. Bern to convey said real property described in said verified petition and in this order, and that said Lucinda Poindexter died before making said conveyance, and that said Axel E. Bern was, before the death of said deceased, and is now, entitled to a conveyance of said property described herein, and good cause appearing therefor;

It is hereby ordered that the hearing of said petition be set for the 13th day of February, 1911, at the hour of ten o'clock A. M. at the Courtroom of this Court, Department No. Ten thereof;

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be served upon said Mary S. Merrill as said executrix, personally, and that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks before said hearing in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Auto Notes

Howard E. Coffin, the noted motor car engineer whose latest achievement is the designing of the 1911 Hudson "33," has just been elected president of the Manufacturers' Contest Association. This very clearly shows the esteem in which Coffin is held by his fellow engineers.

Another shipment of Pope-Hartford cars was unloaded recently and they are now being equipped for immediate delivery by the Consolidated Motor Car Company.

One of the chief agents for the destruction of tires encountered on city streets is the street railway track. Speaking in this connection, C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of the Diamond Rubber Company, said: "Keep your auto out of the car tracks. The steel rails are constantly being worn and frayed by the car wheels and slivers of steel and sharp edges are left on the iron rails. These soon cut the sides out of any tire."

"The selection of a proper lubricant," says Walter Brookins, "for use in an aeroplane is no simple matter. Choice of lubricating oil always demands large consideration from me, since on its perfect work the satisfactory running of the engine, so essential to aviation, is largely dependent. During the San Francisco meet I used Monogram oil exclusively and my judgment was fully vindicated by the service that oil gave."

The Haynes Auto Sales Company reports that a Haynes five-passenger foredoor touring car has just been shipped to Marcus Blanchard of San Jose. Blanchard reports that the 1911 Haynes foredoor line is creating much interest in the Garden City.

Two carloads of Inter-State cars billed to the Motor Sales Company of California are en route from the factory. The shipments include five passenger torpedo body, 50-horsepower seven passenger and interchangeable coupe and roadster cars.

James Radley, the aviator who distinguished himself here by his flights in his Bleriot monoplane, uses a Chalmers "30" car. Radley declares himself an enthusiastic motorist. He has several cars of foreign make in his English garage. In this country, however, he has decided, after a thorough investigation, to use a Chalmers.

Among the exhibits which are attracting wide attention at the New York Madison Square Automobile Show are the cups won by the Lozier over the Fairmont and Elgin courses this year. The Fairmont cup, which went to the Lozier because of its winning the 600 cubic inch class, is in the form of a silver urn, the cover being surmounted by a keystone, emblematical of the Keystone State of Pellsylvania.

The aviation meet, according to E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Company, gave a decided stimulus to the automobile trade. "It is a fact," said Brinegar in this connection, "that people interested in aeroplanes are usually also lovers of motor cars. There is a well defined sympathy between these two types of motor driven vehicles. Both represent speed and both serve to remove the old limitations by which the human physique was bound. Both likewise open up limitless new possibilities to man. The present meet has brought a large number of people interested in motor affairs to town, and these people are taking advantage of the opportunity thus presented them for investigation of the local automobile market. During the last week our salesroom has been unusually crowded with out of town prospects. The interest shown by these people is one of the best indications that has so far come to my notice of the big trade that we can expect this season throughout California."

The Rambler's New Salesroom

The opening of a retail salesroom in the heart of the shopping district of San Francisco is an innovation which has created quite a stir among the automobile dealers. L. H. Bill, manager of the Thomas B. Jeffery Company, says: "The success of an undertaking of this kind by an ordinary agent would undoubtedly be very questionable, but for the Thomas B. Jeffery Company, manufacturers of Rambler automobiles, success of the undertaking is an absolute certainty. Very few people who buy an automobile, and even those who sell them, are aware of the fact that the Thomas B. Jeffffery Company is today by far the wealthiest institution in the United State building automobiles. Only those who have visited Kenosha, Wisconsin, fifty-two miles out of Chicago, realize and appreciate the fact that the Rambler factory is today one of the giant manufacturing plants of the world, and so far as the automobile industry in the United States is concerned, that it is by far the largest. In the early years of the automobile industry of this country this company confined itself to the building of small cars of low horsepower, but with the development of the trade and the consequent demand for large, roomy touring cars, the Thomas B. Jeffery Company has kept in touch with the pulse of the demand of the public, and for the last four seasons has devoted all the facilities of this enormous factory organization toward producing the very best and most up-to-date four-cylinder cars on the market." A visit to the Rambler retail salesroom at 285 Geary street will be found both pleasant and instructive.

Worms No Bar to His Thirst

Harry Lauder revels in a Scotch story he picked up about a temperance lecturer who used for illustration a glass of water, a glass of whisky, and a box of live worms. He would drop a worm into the water and show how it wriggled. Then, dropping it into the whisky, he would exclaim:

"There! One convulsive shudder and it is all over."

"Haud on, there, maister. Are ye sure 'tis the liquor that killed the puir worm?" a voice in the audience asked.

"Quite sure, my friend," replied the lecturer. "No doubt whatever."

"Aweel, then, just pass over the whusky; I'm bothered wi' worms."

Closed Cars

Rambler
Sixty-five Limousine

IN stormy and wintry weather the comfort and convenience of a closed car are most appreciated. The protection afforded and the gratifying comfort give much the same feeling of content one enjoys in his favorite chair in front of the grate fire with the wind howling outside Slow high-gear driving, made possible by the offset crank shaft and straight-line drive, particularly adapt the Rambler to closed car use. The attention given to little things, such as height, width and depth of seats, brocaded silk, pantasote-lined curtains, with Pullman car fixtures, fore doors, cab sides and storm curtains, add distinction to these styles. The limousine appointments include two electric dome lights, electric cigar lighter, bouquet holder, silk hat and parcel rack, umbrella holder, toilet case, card and cigar cases, clock, stationary mirror, whisk broom and holder and megaphone signal.

You may have a demonstration of the Rambler and inspect the closed car at our salesroom.

TOWN TALK

THE PACIFIC WEEKLY

U. S. GRANT HOTEL

San Diego is, without exception, more fortunately situated than any other city in the world. It overlooks one of the world's best harbors, while its atmosphere is the driest marine climate known.

Reared in the heart of the city opposite a park of Cocos Plumosa Palms is the U. S. Grant Hotel, a structure that San Diego may well be proud of. Erected at a cost of over a million dollars this magnificent caravansary occupies an entire block and embodies in its construction every convenience and appliance known to modern hotel building.

Debauched Electorates

The news from Danville like the news from the Ohio village where votes were bought by wholesale in the last political campaign is food for the fattening of reflection. Are these widely separated communities exceptional in character? Or are they typical? It is popularly supposed that most of the rottenness in American politics is concentrated in the large cities, but here we have specific instances of widespread corruption in rural districts; among farmers and clergymen, among hewers of wood and drawers of water who know nothing of the temptations that beset the city dweller; representatives of that great agricultural class with whom love of country is believed to be an absorbing principle, a consuming passion. How many more communities in this land of the free and home of the brave were similarly debauched at the last election? Is it unreasonable to surmise that there were others? Perhaps a general investigation in every State might prove exceedingly profitable now that patriotism is becoming the last refuge of Progressive politicians who are sophistically confounding the right of the people with their power and would have us believe that public opinion everywhere is not only enlightened but honest. We are not sure that it is beyond the power of a grand jury to put a blot on California as well as on Illinois and Ohio. We of California elected a Progressive patriot to Congress from the Second District, and it is said that the pactolian stream which flowed during the campaign from the capital at Sacramento to the forest depths of Redwood Canyon was the broadest and deepest that has gladdened the eyes of man in this State since the golden days of Senator Stanford. It is believed that the money spent in the last campaign to elect one man to the House of Representatives from California exceeded the cost of all our Senatorial elections for twenty years. And yet there are many intelligent citizens who fancy that the Senate is to be purified by amending the Constitution that the dear honest people may have full swing. The more we see of the dear people in action the greater becomes our admiration for those wise old Founders who did their damnedest to prevent the people from performing the inevitable operation on their own throats.

Lodge, the Standpatter

For his faith in the Constitution of his country Senator Lodge of Massachusetts has been derided, ridiculed and reprobated by the Boughten Bulletin. Nobody familiar with the congenital bias of the editor of that journal need have been told that he regarded Senator Lodge with disfavor. Senator Lodge represents the very highest type of statesman, the type to which the tribute of hostility has been paid in every age of the world's history by intriguers and demagogues. He belongs to the school that gave us Bancroft and Everett and Webster, the school that supplies the profession of politics with gentlemen and scholars. Everybody that has followed the career of Senator Lodge knows that he is a man of dignity and self-respect, disposed to recognize the rights of others and the duties he owes to society in all his relations, incapable of degrading himself by intrigues or poisoning legislation to push personal or party interests. It is human nature for men who despair of rising in distinction by their virtues to be envious of such a man as Lodge. As Abraham's riches were the Philistines' envy, and Jacob's blessings had Esau's hatred so the excellence of Senator Lodge excites the rancor of the Boughten Bulletin's editor. Senator Lodge is scoffed at because he is a "standpatter." As though that were something to be ashamed of! To what strange perversions are the ideas and ideals of some men susceptible! To be a "standpatter" a man must stick to principle and be true to himself; he must have a cultivated conscience and be sensitive to its promptings; he must be brave enough to defy majorities; he must be as unafraid of ballots as the heroic soldier is of bullets. The other kind of politician is the meticulous unscrupulous trimmer, alert for the breezes of popular favor, a sordid cowardly wretch who stultifies himself for votes and would sell his soul for a job. The antithesis of the Lodge type of statesman, the politician without principle who thinks chiefly of the next election is a man after the Bulletin editor's own heart.

The Sophistries of Our Agitators

The gentlemen who are advocating the application of the recall to the judiciary have some curious conceptions of the character of the government under which they are living. Basing their argument on the assumption that this is a popular government they tell us that the will of the people should govern at all times. In other words they would have us believe that the sovereignty of the people means the absolute power of the majority. It is hard to believe that these gentlemen are sincere. It is hard to believe that they are as ignorant as from their words they seem to be, or that they are unconscious of the mischievousness of their propaganda. While affecting to be versed in the science of government and in the principles of their own government, they utter views and coin maxims the direct opposite of which are matters of universal acceptance. There are some things that are obvious and that are not to be argued about. The purpose of argument is to discover the truth, and manifestly when the truth is clear and perceptible to everybody it is absurd to make it the subject of argument. Nobody would think of arguing the question whether a nose is one of the features of a normal, finished face. Likewise nobody ought to suppose that there is any necessity of arguing the question whether we are living under what is known as institutional self-government. It is plain to everybody that we have a well-grounded and ramified system of institutions checking and modifying one another, with a power limited by the very principle of self-government in each, yet all united and working toward a common end. Now this being institutional self-government it is of course the very negation of absolutism, whereas the principle of Democratic Might which is as vicious as the principle of Divine Right is nothing but absolutism. Let it not be supposed that we are arguing this matter. We are merely setting forth plain, unvarnished facts of which all educated men, and many that are but half-educated, are cognizable. And so we say it is hard to believe that the U'Rens, the Heneys, the Olders, the Johnsons and all the other purveyors of political piffle are really sincere. We cannot attribute all their views to sublimated ignorance. They may be ignorant of the principles of government, but when, for example, they tell us that the public servant must always obey the public will and never employ his own judgment we know they are not saying what they believe to be true. How is the public servant to be informed as to the public will? Where is the public will on all questions registered? Who has it in his keeping? These are questions that would naturally occur to almost any animal that doesn't express his emotions with his ears. Is it possible that they have never occurred to the gentlemen who are advocating the recall? Finally, we would ask, is it possible that they have any faith in their own arguments; in such an argument, for example as that if the people have sufficient wisdom to select judges it must follow that they have sufficient wisdom to apply the recall? Of course nothing of the kind follows. A man may vote with wisdom for the election of a judge and he may vote with nothing but passion for his recall. A man votes for the election of a judge on impersonal considerations—to have justice administered in all cases; he votes for the recall of a judge for distinctly personal reasons—because the decision in some particular case in which he had either a personal interest, or an interest as one of a class, was not to his liking. In other words the recall requires not the employment of wisdom but the indulgence of resentment.

"Reform Run Mad"

When Senator John D. Works characterized the proposal to apply the recall to the judiciary as "reform run mad" he phrased the psychology of the matter better than he knew. As if to vindicate the verity of the Senator's conception the proponents of the patent political nostrum lately imported from Arizona began to froth copiously at the mouth. The editor of the Boughten Bulletin was transported with canicular rage on the instant that the Works letter was made public, and rabies immediately broke out in the Legislature where a statesman more acutely afflicted than his associates started a movement to have the recall applied to the man whom but a few weeks ago they had elected to the United States Senate. If this isn't reform run mad then we must conclude that the ebullition of frenzy is a manifestation of the normal feelings and mental processes of the gentlemen now devoting themselves to the rescue of the pillars of government. To say that a man has become mad is to imply that he has lost his reason, but loss of reason is not to be argued from oddities and singularities of behaviour. These may be properly attributed to inherent lack of reason. In other words, as Locke explains, there's a vast difference between a fool and a mad man. Our legislators may be merely fools. But whatever they are we are indebted to Senator Works for having contributed to the gaiety of nations by inducing the diverting spectacle made by the legislators when they read his letter. We are also indebted to him for having evoked a telling illustration of the monstrous absurdity of the principle of the recall. What the eccentric advocates of that contrivance think of it; what they conceive to be the purposes to which it may be applied we have learned on the authority of themselves. They tell us in so many words that it may be made to serve not only to remedy what may be thought to be abuses but also to promote universal pusillanimity, to make cowards of us all. Were it in the power of some of them they would recall Senator Works and consign him to eternal perdition—and for what? Is it because he seduced them into evil ways at the outset of their political career? No, they have not been seized with remorse or overcome with shame or imbued with repentance. They would punish Senator Works for daring to express his opinion on a public question. That is the height of his offending. He broke no party pledge, violated no covenant, forswore no policy. At the time he uttered himself the Legislature had not committed itself to the recall, and therefore it cannot even be said of him that he insulted or even criticised the statesmen who had done him a great favor at the sacrifice of their own self-respect. What he did, then, was merely to exercise what is still regarded in some quarters as the inalienable right of free speech, and for his having done so some of the legislators would presume to recall him, presume to recall the man whom they elected, according to their own representations, at what they believed to be the request of the dear people. What an amiable band of bigots are now attempting to reform our government! How long would it take them to rekindle the fires of Smithfield if they had full swing?

His Master Stroke

"The greatest achievement of the present Legislature, and, indeed, of any Legislature of the State of California in the past few decades," says Governor Johnson in a burst of ecstasy, "was witnessed when the Eshelman railroad bill was finally passed by the Senate." And what, pray, is the Eshelman railroad bill? Governor Johnson explains: It is "an act designed to afford relief to a long-suffering commonwealth from the exactions, discriminations and extortions of transportation companies." In a word this is the bill that crushes the Octopus. And yet the monster gave up the ghost without an audible groan. Indeed notwithstanding its tragic fate the incorrigible S. P. is to spend $75,000,000 to double-track its road into California. It doesn't appear to be conscious of the terrible thing that has been done to it. Its passivity almost causes us to suspect the Railroad Commission. For it appears that the great achievement is yet to be rounded out by that distinguished body of public servants. Governor Johnson, it is reassuring to note, expresses confidence in them; knows they will do their duty and all that sort of thing, but remarks nevertheless "It is with the people now to see that their other servants keep their faith." So as a matter of fact there is something still to be done, something that gives us pause, something the thought of which may restrain some of us from felicitating ourselves after the manner of the exuberant Governor as he points with pride to "the wondrous things that have happened," to "the redemption of the State" and "the dawn of a new era." Something akin to these sentiments we have heard somewhere before; have heard them so often, in fact, that they have ceased to enthuse or transport. But Governor Johnson will be reasonable, we hope, and not expect too much of us now that we are looking forward to an achievement that is likely to dim the lustre of all the great achievements which he is incubating. The World's Fair will hold us for awhile.

Hiram on the Job

Under the guise of reform all things are possible, nothing is unjustifiable. Therefore more power to the Administration at Sacramento, and let him be anathema who dares protest against anything that is to be done for the advancement of the greater good! The dawn of a new era has suffused this prosperous State with a roseate glow that charms the eye and refreshes the heart. A wise French socialist remarked more than a century ago that there was nothing so undemocratic as the people. He had in mind of course how speedily the people of France after seizing power made history repeat itself by bestowing that power on a dictator. And now we see history repeating itself once more. Hiram is king at Sacramento and all the people are rejoicing. How speedily was this lawyer but lately come from the heavy atmosphere of the criminal courts, transfigured and raised above himself with the aid of the direct primary,—not by the power of principle but by the potency of his phylacteries which he fashioned between two days and plastered all over his monumental person. Now does Hiram loom large among his insect detractors. The State has confidence in Hiram. It loves to see him dictate the business of legislation and peg away at reforms and cast his penetrating and luminous mind into the midst and marrow of every problem, which, to see is but to solve. The solution invariably is by commission, by the enlargement of the pie-wagon. And all the while the business of government is being centralized in the hands of Hiram, whose frown like Caliph Omar's walking stick may well strike terror to the stoutest heart. Hiram may now repeat the words of another king—"I am the State"—and nobody can say him nay. Consider the tremendous power that this idol of the masses has taken and is taking. Every department of government is to be under his control. He is even to rule the judiciary, for he is to have the appointment of a new court higher for some purposes than the highest tribunal elected by the people, and there is to be no recall for the judges. They are to serve at Hiram's pleasure. Bills have been passed by virtue of which we are to have revised the whole of our social structure and clear ourselves of every usage which has not the sanction of that Peerless Panjandarum who but the other day was defending Chinese murderers and hiring himself out to a Dr. Burke, and who today is the boon companion of a Fremont Older. How beautiful is the confidence which the people have in human nature! The people are not at all alarmed at what is taking place in Sacramento. They are with Hiram heart and soul. For Hiram has said that he is a reformer and the people believe him, and the more power he takes the more they applaud. It has been said that power will intoxicate the best hearts as wine the strongest heads, and that no man is wise enough to be trusted with unlimited power, but Hiram is the exception that proves the rule. And the people know it, and therefore they fear not that he will fail to stand the test to which he has subjected himself. Nothing savoring of misgiving rises in the public breast, not even when Hiram prepares to handle the $18,000,000 to be spent for the purchase of rights of way and quarries under the act creating a State Highway Commission. Nothing that Hiram can do as a propagator of patronage or by way of arrogating to himself more power can taint his circumambience with the breath of suspicion. And meanwhile nobody is asking what may ensue from all these reforms in the event of a man less virtuous than Hiram becoming Governor of this complaisant State. Of course it is quite possible that the experience of San Francisco may become the experience of the whole State. It will be remembered that once upon a time the people of this city gave Mr. James D. Phelan unlimited power, enabling him to build up a wonderful machine, and that shortly after Eugene Schmitz came to the front and availed himself greedily of all the precedents that were established for the benefit of an incorruptible reformer. Is Governor Johnson at all concerned about the future, or is he blissfully humming that delightful refrain "After me the Deluge?"

Perspective Impressions

Why not administer some of that anti-fever serum to the legislature?

At any rate Dorothy Arnold is a welcome relief from Katharine Elkins.

Mrs. Richard Le Gallienne went in "quest of the golden girl" and found that she was a chorus lady.

If a soprano is willing to pay $100,000 for a baritone, how much would a contralto pay for a tenor?

Vivian Gould, aged 18, who married Lord Decies, aged 44, is an accomplished as well as a precocious plutocrat. She smokes cigarettes.

By adopting the recall for judges we shall not be in a class by ourselves. We shall be in the same class with Arizona which has yet to be admitted to Statehood.

While the Legislature is in session let us console ourselves with the reflection that "he that will keep a monkey should pay for the glasses he breaks."

What Senator Works describes as "reform run mad" is described in the Cincinnati paper owned by President Taft's brother as "an attempt to incorporate lynch law in the Constitution of an American State." President Taft's brother as well as the President himself is a reactionary who hasn't sufficient imagination to appreciate the esthetics of lynch law.

Now that women are prohibited from working more than eight hours every mother ought to be required to send her brood to an orphan asylum.

Senator Shanahan having discovered that Charles S. Wheeler owns a great deal of land on the McCloud River concludes that that is the reason why he is against the recall. Unconscious self-revelation in the Halls of State is one of the compensations we have for filling them with shanahans.

On Friday of last week the Examiner raved all over the front page about the police scandal On the thirteenth page were printed the winning numbers of the "Original Nacionel Lottery Company." Who was it advised that the first stone should be cast by the person without sin?

Remembrance

Deep in some ancient forest fragrant with primeval dew
Two stately forest trees with intermingling boughs we grew,
When I went fierce in gold and black, by cave and rock and pool
And wooded way, you went beside me lithe and beautiful.
When challenging the light exultant through the air I sped
You flew beside me; all the heaven was our bridal bed.
And when beneath the soundless deep of watery ways I went
For you I fought the hosts of ocean, proud and jubilant.
Ah, gladly would I go again upon a way that brings Me here, to read again the tale of all my wanderings
In your dark eyes that for a moment look with love grown bold,
And droop 'neath gentle lids, half conscious of the things they hold.

—Seumas O'Sullivan.

Correspondence

Morse Stephens and Zoeth Eldredge

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: It was with no little interest that I read in the Examiner a few days ago an article headed, "Stephens Puts New Light Upon Portola. Historian, in European Research, Finds Real Motive of Journey." Permit me to quote the two opening paragraphs of the article:

"The famous voyage of discovery made by Don Gaspar de Portola was incited by fear of the activities of Russia in Alta California. This is the historical revelation made last night by Professor Henry Morse Stephens of the University of California, at a University of California Club banquet, where he was the guest of honor.

"It was during a recent visit to Spain, in search of manuscripts bearing upon the early history of California, that Professor Stephens discovered documents proving beyond a doubt that Russian aggressions on the California coast prompted the sending out of the Portola expedition. This was only one of several parties that promptly took all claim of California from Russia and made it a territory of Spain."

Mr. Editor, when I read of this "historical revelation" I was a good deal surprised. I do not pretend to know much about the early history of our glorious State, but in common (I imagine) with a great many other patriotic San Franciscans I absorbed quite a little knowledge on the subject at the time of the Portola celebration of fragrant memory. At that time I also acquired a copy of the little book entitled "The March of Portola" by my esteemed friend and townsman Zoeth S. Eldredge. And by reading that book I was made acquainted with the so-called "historical revelation" which Professor Henry Morse Stephens has just sprung upon the public. Why the deuce should Professor Stephens make the long journey to Spain to discover something which he might have learned by consulting Mr. Eldredge's book? I might just as sensibly make a journey to Malta to discover that King George V never contracted a morganatic marriage. Is it possible that the professor never read Mr. Eldredge's book? If so, permit me to refer him to pages 23 and 24 where he will find the following: "At last the Spanish king began to realize that if he would retain his possessions in America, some action was necessary for their protection. Spanish sovereignty in the Pacific was threatened. The Russians had crossed Bering Sea, had established themselves on the coast of Alaska, and their hunters were extending their pursuit of the sea otter into more southern waters. . . . . The king having been warned of the advance of the Russians upon the northern coasts of California, ordered the viceroy of New Spain to take effective measures to guard that part of his dominions from danger of invasion and insult." In the name of "historical revelations" where does the "new light" come in? Will you use your good offices to get the professor to explain himself?

Very sincerely yours,

—A Friend of Zoeth S. Eldredge.

Flipping the Taximeter

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I have just returned from a lengthy stay in New York where I acquired the insidious taxicab habit. I don't know which is more expensive—the taxicab habit or the slot machine habit. In San Francisco, of course, the taxicab habit is worse because there are no slot machines and there are every day, apparently, more and more taxicabs. But even a bad habit may be kept well in hand. Having given up all hope of breaking myself of the taxicab habit I have devoted some time to studying taxicabs and the result is that while I use them more frequently all the time they do not get as much of my money as they used to. The taximeter is the key to the taxicab. (If you're not careful it will prove the key to your safe deposit box and your bank account.) I have investigated the taximeter and I have discovered that it can be flipped. What does that mean? Simply that the flag over the meter can be given a dexterous little shake which will double your fee, even if the taxicab is standing still. I have also discovered that the chauffeurs of taxicabs are intensely human young men who operate on the principle that used to be the slogan of our railways—the principle of charging all the traffic will bear. In other words I have discovered that the chauffeurs are not adverse to flipping the taximeters. In New York a great many others beside myself have discovered this interesting and expensive fact. The consequence is that official action has been taken which has put a stop to the gentle art of flipping. We travel, not alone for ourselves but for our friends; and I would be an unworthy San Franciscan if I did not hasten to warn my friends here of the flipping trick by which so many extra dollars may be taken from their pockets. As one who has learned by experience I say, Keep your eye on the chauffeur and if he flips the flag, don't let him get away with it!

Cordially,

IX—GUY BARHAM

By Edward F. O'Day

When you inspect the personal presentment of Guy Brinton Barham of Los Angeles, San Francisco and Bohemia, you wonder why he doesn't look like a preacher. You feel that he ought to look like a preacher, but you realize that somehow or other he manages to escape the resemblance. He is clerically tall, clerically thin and clerically clean cut. His smoothshaven countenance is the abiding place of multitudinous little wrinkles that crease and deepen and expand when he smiles (which is most of the time), giving him that air of bland and kindly religious tolerance we associate with a clergyman who has been mellowed by time and an indisposition to dwell exclusively on sin, hellfire and damnation. The illusion seems to be carried out by his twinkling brown eyes, by his dark hair which is carefully smoothed down to the temples where it is beginning to get gray, by his firm mouth, the mouth of a good talker and by his soft caressing voice. Taking him all in all you almost—but not quite—expect Guy Barham to be a venerable sort of man. But if you happen to know him you realize bromidically that appearances can be very, very deceitful.

For the only gospel which Guy Barham preaches is the gospel of good cheer, the gospel which knows no heresy but melancholy and gloom, the gospel which declares that it is always fair weather when good fellows get together and that God is not consorious when his creatures take their fling. He is the apostle of camaraderie, is Guy Barham and he has been spreading the faith up and down California for a good many years. When paragraphers write of him—and he has been the theme of a thousand paragraphs—they refer to him as "wit," "bon vivant," "Bohemian." And they are not far wrong. An innate modesty impels Barham to repudiate the allegation of wittiness. He denies that he is witty himself but is willing to admit that he is the cause why wit is in other men. There was that witticism which grew out of his marriage to Miss Marie Baby of Detroit: "I always knew Guy would capture more than any other man in the matrimonial market—he gets a bride and a baby at the same time." Undoubtedly Barham has inspired wit, but it is his modesty which emphasizes the point; and modesty is such a rare gift, particularly in men who have lived a long time in Los Angeles, that it would be ungracious to dispute him. Yet we must insist that Barham is witty himself. He was the author of that never-to-be forgotten proposal to irrigate San Pedro Harbor, an imperishable witticism which Los Angeles will never forgive. Bon vivant he has always been and always will be. His dinners are faultless, his taste in wines exquisite. So thought the Pittsburg millionaire whom he dined at the California Club in Los Angeles and who insisted on reciprocating the following evening. "Mr. Barham," said the Pittsburg millionaire, fingering the wine list, "what was that wine we had last night?" "Three-sixty-five," answered Guy. The Pittsburg millionaire nailed him with a withering look. "Damn the price," he answered, "let's have a bottle of it." There can be no argument about Barham's Bohemianism. He is staider now but there used to be a time when he lived beneath the stars and slept beneath the sun. He was the boon companion of newspapermen and a patron of the drama, which means that he loved to dine actors and wine actresses. His friends still laugh about the time Jesse Bartlett Davis invited Barham and another congenial spirit to her apartments in a Los Angeles hotel. The management protested that the two men had violated a house rule and told them to leave at once. They did and Jesse Bartlett Davis was so incensed at the imputation that she left too, registering at another hotel at one in the morning. The story was wired to a San Francisco paper on which Barham had at least a dozen close friends. To devil him they wired their correspondent to get his version. Barham was sleeping the sleep of the just when the reporter arrived at his home, but he hustled into his clothes and kept the wires busy all through the wee sma' hours trying to kill a story which nobody intended to publish. You see, not all patrons of the drama love the spotlight.

But Barham has not devoted himself exclusively to the career of a wit, bon vivant and Bohemian. He has not fared altogether on cakes and ale. It was quite a busy life which began in The Dalles in 1864. He came of a southern family which crossed the plains in '49 and which has been largely identified with California and Oregon affairs ever since. At the age of two his father moved to Watsonville where Guy Brinton—the Brinton is a tribute to "Little Mac"—went to the village school. When he was nine years old the family moved again, setting up its household gods in Los Angeles and that has been Barham's home ever since. When he finished high school he went into the internal revenue service. After he had been a deputy collector for some time he quit and set up on his own account as a customs broker and has stayed with the business ever since.

Quite early in life he got into politics. "A fellow must have some excuse for going into politics," he explains, "and mine is prenatal influence. I was born with the bug in my system. My uncle, Judge Barham of Santa Rosa, served three terms in Congress and my father was always dabbling." The excuse is not a bad excuse, as excuses go; but Barham has very little to excuse, for he never ran for any office. He was appointed a police commissioner in Los Angeles in 1893. "I was roasted, tarred and almost feathered," he says, "but my motives were not impugned." Then his friend Gage got into the gubernatorial fight and Barham went in with him heart and soul. When Gage was elected he appointed Barham Bank Commissioner. "I accepted at a sacrifice," says Barham; "the only aphorism I have ever gleaned from my knowledge of the game is that no honest man can make money out of politics." He was president of the Bank Commission when the Pardee fight came along. That was a hot fight and there are some who think that the whiskered man would never have been elected if Barham hadn't induced his friend Gage to declare for him on the eve of the election. Perhaps Pardee thought so too, for after he had abolished the Bank Commission, in the approved reform fashion which has been followed by our present governor, in order to get hold of the patronage for himself, he reappointed Barham who served in all three years. "Since then I have never held a political office and by the grace of God I never will," is Barham's devout comment.

Barham waxed prosperous in business and extended his energies to many enterprises. The family acres were turned into town lots at the time of the boom in Los Angeles; the old home became a valuable business property in the heart of the city. And then Barham became a newspaper proprietor. Nine years ago Harriman discovered that the Pacific Improvement Company, a Southern Pacific corporation, owned the San Francisco Post. He ordered it sold, and it went for a song to a syndicate of Southern California capitalists who were projecting a big electric railway from Los Angeles to San Francisco and thought that they needed an organ in this city. Barham was interested in the project and was the ostensible buyer of the Post. He came to San Francisco to find a newspaperman who would keep the Post on a paying basis and he selected Tom Garrett, giving him forty-five per cent of the stock in the paper. The electric railway project fell through shortly before the fire and the Post was sold at a good figure. Barham says that no money was lost on this flier in journalism, but he doesn't think much of his newspaper career.

But just the same Barham has the "nose for news." He knows a good story when he sees it and has given his newspaper friends many a scoop. When the Los Angeles editors want to know who's who in a hurry they ring up Barham and he usually supplies the information. For he can call nearly all the prominent men of California by their first names. He has a genius for making acquaintances and he is ever at the beck and call of committees of entertainment and all that sort of thing. Really, not to know Barham argues oneself unknown.

At the present time he is engaged in preaching his favorite gospel of good cheer more vigorously than ever. He never misses a chance to improve the relations between San Francisco and Los Angeles which, as you know, are very frequently strained. He admits that down in the south they have a way of saying unkind things about the Paris of America, but he excuses them. "It's their ignorance," he explains; "they haven't been here very long and they don't understand the California traditions. Besides they have an awful lot of real estate to sell." The apolgy is accepted, but Los Angeles is warned not to do it again. And Barham says she won't. He says that she is emerging from the chrysalis of sectionalism or words to that effect, and that she is going to put her shoulder to the wheel and help make our fair the biggest success in history. That's the right kind of talk and it has a ring of sincerity when it comes from Guy Brinton Barham, whose slogan is "Hands across the Tehachapi!"

Pastor Expects to be Reincarnated

The Reverend R. J. Campbell, the sensational preacher of the City Temple in London, has added another tenet to his queer "new theology." Speaking before the Theosophical Society he declared his belief that he had lived before as "an individual entity." He also said that it was not at all improbable that Christ would come again. "I rather agree," he said, "with those who think that His work next time will be to lay the foundations of a world-religion—the synthesis of all religions that is certain to follow upon the establishment of the world-civilization that is now approaching." The Reverend Campbell is not over modest, for he declared that if Christ came again, he would himself be reincarnated. The inference is that the Messiah would need the assistance of the City Temple preacher. There have been great examples of effrontery in the world's history, but this is the first time a preacher ever claimed that the Savior would need his help in re-redeeming the world.

Caught the "Guv" in Flagrante Delicto

Eugene N. Foss, Governor of Massachusetts, and incidentally vice-president of the Anti-Cigarette League, has been caught smoking cigarettes by Mrs. Elizabeth White, secretary of the league. Mrs. White visited the State House in order to get the Governor to join in a protest against boys riding in the smoking cars of elevated trains. In the outer office she met the secretary to the Governor. He was placidly puffing a cigarette, which, on recognizing his visitor, he nearly swallowed. Mrs. White passed him with a withering look and sailed into the Governor's office. The most prominent thing on the Governor's desk at that time chanced to be a box of the Governor's favorite brand of what the league's circulars refer to as "coffin nails." At the opening of the door the Governor had hastily removed his own cigarette from his mouth and concealed it on an ash tray. But Mrs. White's eyes were glued to the big box. "I'm glad to see you are investigating these terrible things yourself," she said. "I have come to get you as our vice-president, to help put down the evil." 'U-u-m, yes," said the Governor, anxiously eyeing a wreath of smoke curling up from the far side of the concealed ash tray. "Why, will you believe it," continued the secretary of the Anti-Cigarette League, "some men of prominence have actually declined to help me—even said they smoked the filthy things themselves. Can you believe it?" The Governor drew a long breath. "Madam, I can," he finally declared explosively. "In fact, I smoke them myself, and that's my favorite brand you've got your hand on." The Governor said afterward that he had no recollection of ever becoming a vice-president of the Anti-Cigarette League. Anyhow, it looks as if he would lose the job.

Stage Thunder of the "Times"

After the London "Times" had made a great todo over its alleged discovery that an American newspaper woman named Harriet had been bribing maids, butlers and footmen to furnish her with British society scandal for American newspapers, it was demonstrated quite fully that Harriet was an Englishwoman and that she was selling her scandal to English papers. Investigation proved that Harriet lived in Birmingham, a place which no American correspondent in England would think of selecting, and that after fifteen years of journalistic scandal-mongering for the home papers she made an unsuccessful attempt to establish American connections. The "Times" has not given much space to the latest developments in this case, not caring to eat the humble pie prepared for it by the American correspondents in London who considered that the "Times" story reflected on all of them and went to the trouble of investigating it. Nearly all the other London papers have treated the matter in any but a serious vein.

If you desire California's choicest wines, ask your grocer or wine dealer for those produced by the Italian-Swiss Colony

They Are Crying "Hock" Along the Rhine

The wine shortage in France is approximately 560,000,000 gallons. The figure is arrived at by comparing the present supply with the actual supply at this time last year. Practically all the vineyardists in France are suffering severe loss through this year's disaster. The region most heavily stricken is Champagne, where the yield of 1910, as compared with that of 1909, diminished 96 per cent. But in the great Burgundy region the loss of 80 per cent is much more serious because of the immensely larger importance of the normal production. In the principal Bordeaux region the loss is 64 per cent, while in Touraine it is 51 per cent, and in the far South, 30 per cent. Algeria is already sending in heavy supplies at prices unheard of before. Other wines afford a good, sound base for blending with vintages which in themselves are rather offensive to the French palate. The wine crop in Algeria itself, however, is also short. The present is undoubtedly an excellent opportunity for the exportation of American wines to France. Germany's winemen are already availing themselves of the business opportunity.

Juvenile Courts for France

The example of America in the establishment of special courts for juvenile offenders against the law has made a profound impression in France. Conclusive evidence of this fact has been given recently in the consideration of a project to establish a similar system throughout the republic. The Minister of Justice, who is the sponsor of the proposed law, justified it from the tribune of the Chamber by dwelling upon the remarkable growth of juvenile criminality in recent years. In the debate the nefarious influence upon the young mind of the excessive publicity given to sensational crimes was especially emphasized. The age of responsibility for minors in the proposed law is thirteen years; under that age children will not be subject to repressive punishment, but to reformatory treatment only. There is a question also of placing in the hands of family councils the determination of the moral responsibility of offenders between the ages of 13 and 16.

Think George V Blundered

The Mylius case has not enhanced the popularity of King George V with his thinking subjects. The trial is looked upon as having been unnecessary. The latent prejudice of the British against the public airing of domestic affairs has found a good deal of expression in this connection. The proceedure, too, is criticized for its arbitrary nature. There are many who say that Mylius was condemned before the trial began. The Weekly Nation considers that it would have been better to have had the interesting constitutional point as to an English King's power to appear in the witness box treated of more fully than merely by way of dicta by law officers and the Lord Chief Justice, and adds: "But if it were necessary to challenge such a libel as that of Mylius, it would have been wise to avoid the appearance of harsh or arbitrary proceedings. The prisoner was dealt with on a 'criminal information,' which requires no affidavits and enables the prisoner to be apprehended practically on the presentation of a piece of blue paper by the Attorney General. Is not this an almost obsolete method, with something of the taint of the star chamber about it? And why was the prisoner called on to furnish bail to the extent of $100,000? What chance of liberty before his trial did this afford him? This is to fail in fairness in a case in which fairness was most desirable."

Chiropodists Needed, Not Nurses

The Stockton Mail refuses to take the fighting at Juarez seriously. It publishes a despatch received over its "fleeced wireless system, the durndest in the world" which indicates that chiropodists are needed at the front instead of Red Cross nurses, because the opposing armies are getting bunions instead of wounds. Says the Mail: "Toward noon a puff of smoke was seen on the hills where the insurrectos (sounds like a brand of cigars) are camped. The Mexican regulars at once began retreating. The Mexican regulars have all the soldiers of every nation on earth chained to a stake when it comes to putting on the reverse gear. At that they haven't got it on the cigar-brand soldiers such an awful lot. As soon as the rebels saw the regulars retreating they went 'em one better, retreating twice, whereupon the captain of the regulars insisted that it was his treat, and so he retreated some more. War may be what Sherman said it was, but it isn't nearly so hard on the feet as retreating. It has just transpired that the puff of smoke seen on the hills was the smoke of an Owl cigar. The excitement has greatly abated, but four of the Red Cross nurses turned in their badges and quit. A war correspondent watching the troops through a pair of opera glasses saw three men fall. He is of the opinion that they got a whiff of the smoke. The hero of the day is an Associated Press representative. He found a bullet, and is having it mounted in gold as a souvenir of the rebellion. Already he has refused 200 pesos for it, as it is believed to be the only one in the country."

The Lost Penny

In little Daisy's dimpled hand
Two bright, new pennies shone;
One was for Rob (at school just then),
The other Daisy's own.
While waiting Rob's return she rolled
Both treasures round the floor.

When suddenly they disappeared,
And one was seen no more.
"Poor Daisy Is your penny lost?"
Was asked in accents kind.
"Why, no, mine's here!" she quickly said;
"It's Rob's I cannot find."

Regine

Marcel Prevost (From the French)

We were discussing, a number of friends together, that question so often agitated by moralists: "Has a father or a husband the right to influence, by will or last request, the destiny of his children or his wife?" All agreed conclusively that the disposal of a heart by will is one of the most imprudent bequests that a human being can make, however pure and generous his motives may be. A certain M. Descombes, a notary in the suburbs of Paris, said:

"I have known, in the course of my career, several examples of such imprudence and I always dissuade from it those of my clients who are inclined to listen to me. People departing this life often cause a great deal of trouble. The saddest case with which I was ever connected was as follows:

"From the time I was first a lawyer's clerk I was received rather cordially in the society of our little town, which, although quite near to Paris, was very provincial. I was very fond of dancing and could play a quadrille or waltz fairly well on the piano of the justice of the peace or the civil engineer. I had the good spirits of a youth of twenty-four. In short, with the two hundred francs allowance from home, my monotonous occupation, my simple-minded friends and the modest ambition of succeeding to M. Gobin in his judicial chair, I was perfectly happy.

"A young clerk without fortune is interested in marriageable young girls and they were numerous in the society of this little town. Some were rich. Some were amiable. Some were even pretty. I did not need to dance many cotillions to discover that a just fate rarely united all three of these attributes in the same person, blonde or brunette. I had a good deal of common sense, so, while polite to all, I avoided a too close scrutiny of the very beautiful eyes. I selected a little person over whom there was no rivalry, for she was timid and without beauty. When I married her, five years later, she brought me as dowry M. Gobin's judicial chair, and I was perfectly happy with her for seventeen years—too short a time."

M. Descombes fittingly gave a moment of meditation to the memory he had evoked. Then he resumed his story:

"My special friend, Huvelin, chief clerk of the direct tax office, was less wise than I. Poor himself, he fell in love with the poorest among our partners in the waltz, a young lady named Regine de Pilliere, daughter of a captain of infantry, retired since the war. Captain Pilliere was a widower. His daughter, having at her disposal the modest income her father enjoyed as a retired captain and chevalier of the Legion of Honor, kept house with admirable economy. Add to this the fact that Regine, a charming brunette, had found the good-looking Huvelin sufficiently attractive to refuse on his account a very good offer—the young Coubert, son of a well-known manufacturer of the neighborhood. As you may imagine, this greatly annoyed M. de Pilliere. You begin to see the point in this little provincial drama, do you not? At sixty-five M. de Pilliere had a first attack of apoplexy, which left him paralyzed in the right arm although still in complete possession of his mental faculties. Regine nursed him with passionate devotion, but seven months later a second attack carried him off.

"He left his daughter penniless. A will found in his desk expressed the anxiety which his daughter's future caused him. He recommended her to the care of one of his friends, a military man of high position, closing with these words: 'If my dear daughter, Regine, wishes me to rest quietly in my grave, I beg her to reconsider her first decision and marry M. Francois Coubert, who loves her sincerely.'

"Regine behaved heroically. She assured Huvelin that he need no longer hope, and married Francois Coubert. It was I who drew up the contract. I had at that time such a tender heart that I let a tear fall in the very middle of the page—which drew down on me a severe reprimand from M. Gobin.

"Regine became Mme. Coubert. She was rich. She had children. Coubert was at heart a good fellow and treated her well. Nevertheless Regine was not happy. I knew, because, as Huvelin had left the country, she transferred to me a little of the affection which she cherished for the absent one. During the twenty years of my acquaintance with Mme. Coubert I learned to recognize this strange truth—that a thoroughly good woman may be faithful in two contradictory directions. Regine was absolutely faithful to her husband, but she never withdrew from Huvelin the affection she had given him years before. Coubert, who knew it, scarcely troubled himself about it. He was an easy-going, cheerful fellow, who did not waste time in considering abstract sentimental possibilities. So long as his wife was attractive, a good housekeeper and faithful to him, he was satisfied. But Regine never recovered entirely. The wound her young heart had received never closed and I believe, for my part, that this wound was the remote cause of the nervous malady to which she succumbed prematurely in middle life.

"The story I am telling you is that of many women and I could relate to you ten others, very similar, the facts of which I witnessed, or which were confided to me. But this one had a sequel which was truly touching. When the poor woman had at last gone to her long rest, I helped her husband arrange her private papers. Happily we found no written trace of the mental suffering she had endured. The secret remained between her and me. We observed with emotion that she had reverently preserved all the trifling objects which had belonged to her father, including his notebooks on lectures at the school of Saint-Cyr, which M. de Pilliere had liked to look over during the last months of his illness. On opening mechanically one of these books I found in it a sheet of paper, yellow with age, on which were scrawled these words in a trembling, awkward hand:

"'With the dread of death hanging over me, I do not feel that I have the right to dispose of the heart of my child. I now cancel the last clause of my will of the eighteenth of January Regine shall marry as she thinks fit.'

"The writing, as I said, was that of a child just learning—just the writing of the captain when, in the interval between his two attacks, he used to practice writing with his left hand. Had Regine known this too late? She had never spoken of it, and I am inclined to believe that she really remained ignorant of it. Probably the paper had remained in the book on which it had been written and its existence had never been suspected. Regine had kept faithfully all the mementos of her father; but there was no appearance of her ever having turned over the leaves of this notebook on descriptive geometry.

"Thus the life of this charming woman had been ruined by the scrupulous observance of a last wish—what am I saying?—of a false semblance of a last wish!

"Regine had dedicated her life to the veneration of an error!

"I confess I was crushed by my discovery. M. Coubert noticed my emotion and it was impossible to prevent him from reading the paper.

"It took him some time to grasp the meaning of it. And, when he did understand it, do you know what he said to me?—this husband, weeping though he was, for his sorrow was sincere:

"'How fortunate, my dear friend, how fortunate, that Regine did not find this paper before the day of our marriage!'"

Who is Harley P. Wilson?

The litigation in the Palmer Oil Company between Frank L. Brown of the World's Fair committee and Harley P. Wilson has filled a number of people with curiosity as to the personality and antecedents of Wilson. This curiosity is particularly strong among the unfortunate depositors of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company, for Wilson is the man who came to this city from New York under the chaperonage of Walter J. Bartnett to engineer the rehabilitation of the bank. He has been here a long time now and the rehabilitation of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company seems still to be the remotest of possibilities. Meanwhile he has engaged in other enterprises, among them Palmer Oil and in that company his proceedings have been so distasteful to some of his associates that they are trying most vigorously to oust him. Might it not be well for the depositors of the defunct bank to find some means of satisfying their not unreasonable curiosity about Harley P. Wilson? There are several men who ought to be in a position to explain, mayhap to justify him. Leaving Walter J. Bartnett, W. C. Peyton and Colonel Henry I. Kowalsky out of the reckoning—for they seem to deserve the honor of discovering him—it is possible that Hawley, the railroad financier, Ray of the American Tobacco Company, Earl of the Nepocene Mine in Canada and Wehrhane, the private banker of Nassau street, might contribute to a fund of information that would be valuable to the inquirers.

Who Are His Backers?

During the time that Wilson has been in our midst the men whom I have named have been rather vaguely referred to as his backers, but only one of them, Wehrhane the banker, has been known to take any direct interest in the affairs of the broken bank. He, I believe, examined some of its assets and offered the cheerless opinion that they had depreciated in value. Before he came here from New York Wilson was supposed to be worth between $250,000 and $500,000, but he was not rated by the commercial agencies, it being understood that he did not seek credit and was not engaged in any particular line of business. Still he maintained an office in Broad street as well as a secretary, so it is to be presumed that he transacted some sort of business. Was he the confidential agent of one or more of the financiers who are supposed to have recommended him? There seems to be no answer to the question. Perhaps a wire to one of them might elicit the information.

A Glittering Program

Wilson came to San Francisco with a great flourish of trumpets. It was announced that the depositors were to be paid one hundred cents on the dollar and that the bank was to be reopened and made the western connection of some big financial institution in New York which would be delighted at the opportunity to start business with 12,500 names on its books, that being the number of depositors in the California Safe Deposit and Trust. It was arranged that some New York syndicate was to put up a million dollars, that the depositors and stockholders were to put up another million, making a paid-up capital stock of two millions and that Wilson was to have an option on the remaining three millions of stock, the bank being capitalized at five millions. Wilson arrived here in state and announced that he was "ready to perform." The bank was to be opened by Portola Day. The requisite ninety per cent of the stockholders agreed to the project, but the project did not go through. There were all sorts of delays and excuses for delay. The assets had depreciated, such and such a financier who was counted on had died, Wilson had to go to Europe, etc. When he was pressed to show results Wilson submitted a less roseate proposition. He would pay, not one hundred per cent but sixty-five—forty per cent in cash and twenty-five per cent in stock of the bank's industrial assets. The depositors were angry but seventy-five per cent of them finally agreed to the new proposition. But there were more delays. There was the trouble with the Walker estate and so on. Meanwhile Walter J. Bartnett has been slowly but surely disentangling himself from the meshes of the criminal law, the stockholders' liability is expiring and the depositors have yet to glimpse the prospect of an adjustment. It is no wonder they want to know a few things, among them being whether Bartnett holds a big block of Western Pacific stock.

"Where are you going, my pretty maid?"
"I'm going to Fishhook, sir," she said.
"And where may that be, my pretty maid?"
"At the end of the line, you jay!" she said.

An Irish Row

St. Patrick's Day is to be more abundantly celebrated this year than heretofore. Instead of one celebration there will be two—one under the auspices of the A. O. H. and the other under the auspices of all the other local Irish societies, a score in number. It is not because the Irish have become more sentimental than usual that they have decided on holding two celebrations. It is because they have had the most natural thing in the world—an Irish row. In former years all the Irish societies joined hands in the celebration of the birthday of Ireland's patron saint, and the A. O. H. dominated the celebration, but this year the Hibernians decided to flock by themselves. This they did, I am told, because the leaders of the organization felt that they would not be able to control the Convention of Irish Societies. So the Irish societies which greatly outnumber the Hibernians in membership organized for a separate celebration and selected Father Yorke for orator of the day. Then Father Crowley of the Mission Promotion Association, who is chaplain of the Hibernians and the inspiration of many of their activities, started out on a still hunt for an orator, resolved to discover one with drawing power equal to Father Yorke's. And he discovered Father McQuaide, the popular priest who won so much glory in Washington during the fight for the Fair. Father McQuaide was asked to orate for the Hibernians, but, so the story goes, he wasn't informed about the Irish row. He agreed to become the orator of the day. But a little later he heard of the split, and, according to report, he grew warm under his Roman collar and sent word to the Hibernians that they'd have to find another orator. Meanwhile it is interesting to follow the Leader, to which, it is popularly supposed, Father Yorke is a contributor. The Leader tells us that certain men have conspired to disunite the Irish for sinister purposes, and urges the Hibernians to remember "that memorable October night in Metropolitan Temple when you saw their snares and delivered your souls alive." That was the night, I believe, when Father Crowley tried to make James D. Phelan an emergency chairman and got Jimmy roundly hissed for his pains.

Tears in the Probation Home

A queer fish indeed is Willard P. Hatch, recently divorced from his job of chief probation officer. Perhaps he may serve as an illustration and point the moral of a necessary reform. The men who most frequently engage in the various sorts of work for the uplift of boys and girls are too often the sort of men whom one instinctively dislikes. They seem to lack the manly qualities; they arouse in the most distinterested minds suspicions as to their sincerity. Perhaps it is largely due to the cant they talk. Perhaps their positions render a holier-than-thou attitude almost inevitable. I am not speaking, mark you, of the men who do this sort of work from religious or philanthropic motives, but of the men who engage in it for a salary. They appear to dupe themselves very often and those with whom they come in contact still more frequently. This is not surprising. The amateurs of settlement work are generally simple souls, unversed in the world's wickedness, prone to accept people at their own valuation and committed to a scheme of morals which divides the world broadly into the good and the bad. It is not a very healthy atmosphere. Hatch charged it with a feeble electricity when he compiled a pamphlet on the social evil, using the frank language one is accustomed to in health bulletins and medical reviews. He shocked the probation workers. There was more or less todo in consequence and quite incidentally Hatch's past was uncovered. It seems that there were several smudgy spots in Hatch's past and he tried to blot them out with tears. We are told that he wept for forty-five minutes. If that is true he probably shed more tears than a normal man sheds in a lifetime. And then he talked about "the Light." He has seen "the Light" since he last smudged his soul; he has been "converted." He would have been more convincing if he had hidden his "Light" under a bushel.

CANDY QUALITY

The women are the final judges of candy excellence. Geo. Haas & Sons have four large stores in San Francisco. WHY?

A Bad Liver and a Light

I can't deny my life has been erratic;
I've done a lot of things that weren't right;
I used to cuss to make my talk emphatic—
But that took place before I saw the Light.
I must admit I did a lot of boozing;
I couldn't count the times that I've been tight;
And though my conduct I am not excusing—
It all took place before I saw the Light.
There is no doubt that I was quite flirtatious;
I had a new date almost every night;
I knew some peaches too, but then, good gracious
That happened long before I saw the Light.
I hope you do not doubt my great sincerity;
I really am repentant, honor bright;
But flesh is weak and virtue such a rarity
That sometimes I forget I saw the Light!

Judge Lindsey Recommended Him

Judge Lindsey of the probation court of Denver plays an important part in this mean affair. From the newspaper report it seems that Hatch was involved in a "nasty scandal" while a probation deputy in Judge Lindsey's court. Yet we learn that the little judge was among Hatch's warmest supporters when the latter applied for the probation job here, and that it was mainly on Lindsey's recommendation that he was given the place. Why did Judge Lindsey recommend a man who had been involved in a "nasty scandal"? Did Hatch tell the judge that he had seen "the Light"? and did the judge take him at his word? Or was Judge Lindsey so busy smoking the Beast out of the Jungle at so much per smoke that he failed to give the matter the consideration it deserved? It would be interesting to get the judge's explanation of this mystery. If I thought he'd explain I'd hazard the cost of a night letter to Denver.

English Justice

The attention of the learned gentlemen of the Commonwealth Club and of the half-baked lawyers of the Bar Association is respectfully called to the decision of the highest court of England in the case of King vs. Fisher which is to be found in the Law Reports of the King's Bench Division for 1910. I am eager for them to read this decision because of the many new principles of justice which they have invented in the hope of having justice administered in this country along the same lines upon which it is administered in England. One of their pet notions is that in England when by the evidence the guilt of a man is clearly established all technicalities are ignored on appeal. In the opinion of the commonwealthers technicalities are nothing but devices by which confusion worse confounded is facilitated for the benefit of lawyers. So they are in favor of permitting the State to reinforce legitimate evidence with illegitimate and of making our courts progressive by going back to the methods by which the Calas tragedy of the eighteenth century was made memorable. But they will see from the decision of the court presided over by Lord Chief Justices Alverstone, Coleridge and Channell that in England where the prosecution has not even the aid of professional jurors, demagogic judges and yellow newspapers, the rules of law for the protection of men accused of crime are not so loose as those which our Legislature has been persuaded to enact.

Guilty But—

In the case of King against Fisher the defendant was convicted of obtaining goods by false pretenses. The judge before whom the case was tried was of temperament somewhat similar to that of our own darlings—Lawlor and Dunne. In addition to the evidence given in support of the indictment he permitted the introduction of other evidence tending to show that the defendant was an habitual swindler who had long followed a systematic course of fraudulent conduct in obtaining goods. Because he did this; because he did what Lawlor and Dunne did in the graft cases, the verdict was set aside by the highest court in the land—and there has been no talk of a recall. "We are of the opinion," said the learned justices, "that the evidence as to the other cases was inadmissible in this case, because it was not relevant to prove that he had committed the particular fraud for which he was being charged, in that it amounted only to a suggestion that he was of a generally fraudulent disposition." And this is not all that the learned justices said. They went further and enunciated in plain English a principle wholly at variance with the principle of some of our hysterical publicists respecting the Ruef case. By these publicists it is argued that as we know that Ruef confessed to his guilt in the French restaurant cases therefore we know that he is guilty of the crime of which he stands convicted; also that as the evidence rightly admitted seems conclusive he should not be given either a new trial or even a rehearing. This is the language of the English justices: "Therefore, although there was sufficient evidence to convict the prisoner without the evidence as to the other cases, in accordance with the rule laid down in this court, the conviction cannot stand." It is precisely because this rule is followed by our courts that the gentlemen of the Commonwealth Club have been contributing to the clamor that has so well served the purpose of the agitators who are demanding the application of the recall to the judiciary.

How Cooney Lost

The Commonwealth Club's conception of what constitutes a legal technicality reminds me of a story that Judge Hunt used to tell years ago about Michael Cooney, an attorney who was regarded as singular in his day because in his day the bar of California abounded in intelligence and ability. If Cooney were practicing law today he would rank as one of the leading members of the Bar Association. One day, so the story goes, "Judge" Cooney appeared before Judge Hunt as attorney for the plaintiff in a damage suit. He demanded for his client $50,000. He put in his evidence, and utterly failed to show that the defendant caused the injuries complained of. Then he arose with the air of solemnity which he always wore and bestowing a look of mingled triumph and defiance on the attorney for the defendant announced that he had closed his case. Thereupon the attorney for the defendant who could hardly suppress a smile softly moved for a non-suit. "Motion granted," said Judge Hunt without a moment of hesitation. "Judge" Cooney was so accustomed to the knock-out punch that it never feazed him. Calmly, with great dignity and countenance inscrutable he gathered up his law books and strode out of the court-room. His client, a little Irishman, was at his heels in a state of feverish anxiety. Hardly had they made their exit when the client, plucking his lawyer by the sleeve, asked, "Do we get all, jidge?" Cooney paused, looked gravely at his client and said, "No; by reason iv a teckneckallity in th' law we don't get a damn'd cint."

The Director-Generalship

Presently some great minds will get together and select a director-general for the World's Fair. Meanwhile there is some wire-pulling for the job and considerable curiosity as to the probable winner. The question as to the man upon whom the choice of the great minds will fall is second in importance to the question of the site that will be selected for the Fair. As to the man best fitted for the job that is a question upon which there appears to be hardly any difference of opinion. Ask almost any man you meet, and he will tell you that he can think of nobody better equipped for the director-generalship than M. H. De Young. Everybody remembers that Mr. De Young made a success of the Midwinter Fair; that he not only conceived the idea of that Fair but realized it against the overwhelming opposition of pessimistic croakers and pulled it through with a balance on the right side of the ledger which enabled him to give us the nucleus of the Park Museum. It is felt that with Mr. De Young as Director-General there will be no cliques in the management, no special interests to favor, nothing but zeal for the success of the Fair and the independence of spirit essential to the carrying out of the determination to make the Fair exactly what it is intended to be—a great public enterprise. I am told that Mr. De Young is not a candidate for the position, but that doesn't mean that he wouldn't accept it if it were offered to him. I am also told it is proposed to offer the position to Theodore Roosevelt, but I doubt that anybody believes that the Colonel will accept.

Brown in Boston

The Rev. C. R. Brown, late of the First Congregational Church, Oakland, is still at liberty, a sort of free lance of the pulpit. From Boston recently came the news that he had declined the presidency of the Boston University, but his most intimate acquaintances regard this report as somewhat inaccurate. They know that it was the ambition of his life to become the president of that university, and it is hard for them to believe that he had the job within his grasp and flung it away. They are rather inclined to the opinion that if he was offered the long-sought honor there was a string tied to it. They surmise that perhaps he was told that as a condition precedent certain stains must be removed from his reputation. Shortly after Dr. Brown's arrival in Boston an organ of the Congregational Church gave him a clean bill of health. It was explained that the scandal in which he was involved in California was contrived by his enemies to punish him for espousing the cause of the graft prosecution. Dear old graft prosecution! Everything that happens hereabouts for the next fifty years will be traced back either to the graft prosecution or the earthquake. Dr. Brown's apologist says that the night on which the reverend one yielded his pulpit to certain civic patriots somebody whispered in his ear that revenge would be wreaked upon him. Some three years later the blow was struck. Now let us hear from the other clergymen who took a much more active part than Brown in that great civic contest. Did a mysterious voice whisper the direful threat to them also? If so they'd better mind their p's and q's. My advice to them is to write no letters which the world cannot understand; to cultivate no platonic friendship of the kind to which a clergyman's wife might object; to do nothing, in short, which might prompt them to deceive the trustees of their church and lead those gentlemen to chagrin and mortification.

Newspapermen as Tax-eaters

There are more newspapermen occupying State offices now than at any time within the memory of the most inveterate veteran reporter. A. B. Nye, the Oakland editor, is Controller and gets the biggest salary of the lot. General Forbes, the Adjutant General, is a newspaper publisher. Tom Eby, an old newspaperman, is secretary of the State Board of Equalization. Secretary of State Frank Jordan has four ex-journalists on his staff. Joe Mansfield who used to be city editor of the Call is head of the Auto Vehicle Department; Al Healy, formerly of the Chronicle, is Mansfield's assistant; J. M. Cremin, statistician and Frank Barnes, registrar, were Sacramento Union men. Leonard Compton of the State Forester's office, was a Scripps-McRae man. A. L. Seavey, secretary of the State Board of Examiners, Jacob Alexander of the Adjutant General's office, and J. W. Jeffrey, State Horticulturist, were all knights of the pad and pencil.

"My name," said the great tragedian, "has adorned many billboards." "And mine," said the comedian, "has adorned many board bills."

He is Off to Juarez

Jack Follansbee is on his way to Juarez. The sentence reminds one of Kipling's, "Jack Barrett went to Quetta," but there is no further resemblance in the two incidents. Jack Follansbee is on his way to Juarez because he has racing interests there. Rude persons may here ejaculate, "Who in h—— is Jack Follansbee?" That is just the point. For the question has been asked before. About a year ago, it will be remembered, Lord Kitchener of Khartoum was entertained at a banquet at the Palace. One of the newspapermen who described the affair began his article with this amazing statement: "He looks like Jack Follansbee." It is said that when Kitchener glanced through the papers next morning and saw that sentence he asked: "Who in h—— is Jack Follansbee?" A whole lot of people less distinguished than the man who made the Mahdi bite the dust ventured the same interrogation. And then it "transpired," as the newspapers are so fond of saying, that Jack Follansbee was a cousin of William Randolph Hearst. Jack Follansbee immediately assumed importance in the popular imagination as being the man whom Kitchener had the remarkably good fortune to resemble. It must have been gratifying to Kitchener. It was undoubtedly a pretty compliment to Jack Follansbee and to his cousin William Randolph Hearst. I am glad that I have the opportunity of recalling Jack Follansbee to the thoughtless public by chronicling his journey to Juarez. He goes there because he is a steward of the Juarez Jockey Club and war's grim-visaged front which has been making faces at Juarez cannot keep him away; a circumstance that seems to prove that he has the courage as well as the features of Kitchener.

"War" and the Thoroughbreds

When Jack Follansbee gets to Juarez he will find the "war" raging fiercely. From reports which I have read it is difficult to determine just why the "war" is raging. Some insist that it is a contest for emancipation from the yoke of Diaz; others are just as positive that the armies are contending for a chance to get a bet down on the thoroughbreds at Juarez. The situation, I am told, is really desperate; it is actually impossible to borrow money from an insurrecto to bet on the races. He wants to place it all himself. I hear too that the successful jockeys are now called "generalissimos" and the horses "chargers." The greatest sufferers from the "war" are the American cavalrymen at El Paso who are experiencing great difficulty in getting the entries. But on the other side of the river it is part of the military code for a general who gets a "good thing" to pass it along to his fellow commanders. From a veracious correspondent I receive this incident of the "war": A deserter from the insurrectos was brought into the Mexican camp tonight and was taken at once to the headquarters of the Federal commander. When searched a curious steel implement was found in his possession. It was shaped like the letter "S."

"What's this? What are you doing with this?" demanded the great Mexican General. The prisoner at first refused to answer.

When told that he would be shot at sunrise if he did not instantly divulge the design and uses of this curious implement of warfare, he replied: "Si, senor, it is a footpick."

"Curses upon your lying heart!" exclaimed the great general. "Worst of all the Spanish curses; may the wind blow upon the back of your neck! I know what this "S" stands for. It means Salali to win the fifth race at Juarez tomorrow afternoon." "Si, senor." "Take him away," roared the grandiose Mexican commander. "We shall see if this fellow has a chance to attend the races tomorrow. But we shall be there in full force."

Wreathing Our Heroes

My esthetic sense disapproves the recurring spectacle which is offered as our conquering heroes return from the theater of war to tell us how the glorious victory over New Orleans was won. I refer to the spectacle of these same glorious heroes entering the city disguised in flowers. I am not chary of gratitude for the work they did in Washington, but I would fain see the general appreciation expressed in some less poetical form. It was all right for the judges of the old Olympian games to brow-bind the victorious athletes with leafy crowns, but we are too far away from Arcadia nowadays and these floral tributes look ridiculous. The only occasion when a man may suitably receive flowers is at his own funeral and thanks be! our exposition champions are still very much alive. To behold them posing for their pictures in wreathed smiles and wreathed scapulas is provocative of laughter. Do not our heroes feel a bit sheepish about it? Did Father McQuaide and Mayor McCarthy and Leon Sloss and Thornwell Mullally feel perfectly at ease when they were smothered in violets signifying modesty and ferns signifying fascination and jonquils signifying doubt in love? Or had they a sort of beef-steak-smothered-in-onions sensation? Without any personal disrespect for the gentlemen themselves the Man Who Winds the Ferry Clock regarded their decorations with a derisive eye. He confided to me that they looked like prize bulls at a fair.

William Edward Dargie

The people of Oakland suffered a considerable loss when death put an end to the activities of William E. Dargie, proprietor of the Tribune. Dargie was in all senses of the term a public spirited citizen, and he contributed more than any other individual to the advancement and development of the community across the bay. Let not this assertion be taken as a generous contribution to perfunctory eulogy of the dead. Of the truth of it substantial testimony is afforded by monumental witnesses. At this moment there is in course of construction in Oakland a mammoth steel structure which, when completed, will be one of the finest hotels on the Pacific Coast. This enterprise would have been abandoned by the bankers who projected it had it not been for the incessant hammering of William E. Dargie. With characteristic energy and persistency, week in and week out, he pegged away at the rich men who had grown fearful of risking their money in an enterprise that had been conceived in a moment of civic enthusiasm, and they finally yielded to his persuasions. It was Dargie who started the agitation for the boulevard around Lake Merritt, and who conceived and consummated many of the public improvements of which the people of Oakland are now proud. His influence in public matters was of course due to the power of his newspaper, the Tribune. He became the owner of that journal when he was only twenty-two years of age and when Oakland was but a small village. Under his management the Tribune was a paper of rapid growth. Dargie was not satisfied with a village paper. He was an ambitious journalist, and he gave the people a paper that was always just a little ahead of the community from which it derived its support. There is nothing more truly metropolitan in Oakland today than the Tribune. It has no peer among the evening papers hereabouts. As the proprietor of the Tribune Dargie waged incessant war against the silurians and the politicians with a superfetation of righteousness, the consequence being that he made many enemies to whom he was as

San Francisco and the Alaska Trade

I was talking the other day to a man of many big enterprises who has heavy interests in Alaska and he asked me why the San Francisco merchants did not take concerted action to obtain some of the valuable Alaska trade. Not knowing I had to parry by asking a question in turn and I elicited some very interesting information. I learned, for instance, that the imports of Alaska for the past year totalled $57,000,000 which is more than the combined imports of all the insular possessions of the United States with Cuba and Porto Rico thrown in. I found out that Alaska deals almost exclusively with Seattle which is waxing fat on the Alaska trade, but that Alaskans have any but kindly feelings for the merchants of Seattle on account of the way they have been gouged by them, and that they would welcome any effort of San Francisco to take the business away from the more northern city. At present, I believe, San Francisco gets so small a part of the Alaska business that it is really negligible. Isn't it up to somebody to talk right out in meeting on this important subject?

The Comstock Boom

There has been quite a boom on the stock exchange recently, the Comstock list which has been quiescent for a long time manifesting surprising signs of vitality. Some of the brokers attribute the advance to the latest discovery of ore in the Mexican Mine in connection with which an interesting incident is narrated. Young Frank Symmes, the son of the receiver of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company, was sent to Nevada by the Sturgis interests of Scranton, Pennsylvania, who control the Mexican, to do what he could for the rehabilitation of the property. Symmes is an engineer who has had some experience building bridges in the Philippines, but the people who have been paying dividends on Mexican stock for more years than they care to count, were not optimistic about his appointment. Shortly after Symmes took hold a valuable body of ore was discovered and the young engineer wired a big buying order to New York and when the boom came he cleaned up a very pretty sum. The street is very envious about his coup.

Englebright is "Peeved"

Those who have the time to bother about such small matters in Washington are laughing at the way Congressman Englebright has been trying to snub Judge Raker of Modoc who will succeed him in the next session of Congress. Englebright never dreamed that a Democrat would beat him for re-election and he hasn't gotten over the terrible shock yet. Some people say he never will. Raker and his wife are in Washington, the judge being enthusiastic about his new job and eager to see the wheels go round. But Englebright cannot be polite to his successor. He gets the creeps whenever Raker looms on the horizon. This is the way he let out his bile a few days ago for the benefit of a newspaperman: "Raker has no standing here except as a private citizen, and won't have till after March 4. I've gotten the only remaining big thing there was to get for the first district and there won't be much for him to do. We don't speak as we pass; and we are living in the same hotel too. He didn't come to call on me when he arrived in Washington and of course I'm not going to call on him. We met at the California luncheon some time ago and were seated at the same table. I tried to be pleasant to him there, but since then I do not see him when he walks my way." Of course Raker may have rubbed Englebright the wrong way, for Raker hasn't a superfluity of tact, but if the beaten congressman possessed a sense of humor he would not take the world into his confidence. A lame duck squawking about the inevitable!

The Rage for Californiana

Ever since the fire collectors have been eagerly gathering together books connected with the early history of the State and city. In the old days there were a few notable collections of Californiana, but most of them were destroyed. Nowadays there are many collectors, so many that it is only in out of the way places that one can now pick up anything of value without paying what seems an exorbitant price. The extent to which the fad—if it may be styled a fad—has been carried was indicated last week by some of the prices paid for Californiana at the auction of a collection made by Charles Remington, a local newspaper man. A set of the Overland Monthly from July, 1868, to December, 1907, brought $90. Ned McGowan's Narrative, a presentation copy from the author, brought $30.50. Alexander Forbes' History of Upper and Lower California, a London publication, was sold for $18. The first edition of Bret Harte's first book, "Outcroppings," was knocked down for $5.50. Bayard Taylor's "Eldorado" fetched $6. Joseph A. Stuart's "My Roving Life" brought $5.60. Grey's "Pioneer Times in California" brought $6. Single copies of early California newspapers, some with nothing to make them interesting except their age, brought as much as a dollar apiece. A photograph of the hanging of Casey and Cora, said to be the only one in existence, went for $7. A map of the first railroad survey made in California brought $9. A tinted lithograph of the water front of San Francisco in 1857 brought $37. These prices indicate the interest which collectors are taking in our earlier days. Some day a patriotic Californian will buy up a lot of small collections about San Francisco and present them to one of the libraries.

As to That Gerrymander

"What is all this excitement about depriving San Francisco of some of her senators and assemblymen?" asked the Man Who Winds the Ferry Clock as he was quitting work the other day. "The whole thing is a joke," he went on without waiting for a reply. "What does it matter whether San Francisco is represented by eighteen assemblymen or eleven, by nine senators or five? What has the number got to do with it? In San Francisco we go in for quality in our statesmen, not quantity. Our senators and assemblymen have always been men of class. We have always been careful to send to Sacramento lawmakers with lots of experience, men who have made a life study of public affairs, men of the highest integrity. The standard has been so high that even if the number were reduced our representatives would still strike a better average than the lawmakers from other parts of the State. Yes, sir, it is quality that counts, not quantity; and we are strong on quality and always have been. Why, our legislators are of such fine character that even if they should be gerrymandered out of their jobs they would not feel hurt about it. They are doing San Francisco a favor by representing us." And the Man Who Winds the Ferry Clock winked at me, very much to my surprise, for I thought he meant it all.

Jennie Crocker as a Hiker

It will be remembered that on the historic occasion when "Tommy" Sears tried to walk from Burlingame to Del Monte, Templeton Crocker made part of the journey with her on foot while his sister Jennie went along in a motor car. Any imputations which may have been cast at that time on Miss Crocker's hiking ability have since been removed. It has been demonstrated that as a hiker Miss Crocker is really in the same class as her athletic chum from the Back Bay. Think of a young woman proposing to walk from El Portal to Merced, a distance of eighty-five miles, and actually footing a great part of that distance! Miss Crocker is the young woman in question and her feat was shared by Mrs.

MRS. M. A. TOBIN

One of the patronesses of the vaudeville which will be given at the Central Theater on the evening of February 21 and the afternoon of February 22 for the benefit of the Catholic Settlement and Humane Society.

George McNear and Mrs. Will Taylor. The party went to Yosemite Valley in the private car "Miskawaka," but when they decided to return they found that traffic over the railroad was impossible owing to landslides. The Mesdames McNear and Taylor may have been dismayed but not so Miss Crocker. The married ladies may have argued that it would be just as well to wait in the pleasant seclusion of the hotel at El Portal until the tracks were cleared, but if they did their arguments were swept aside by Miss Crocker. "Let's walk to Merced," she cried and walk it was. For five hours the pedestrians counted ties along the Merced river, occasionally availing themselves of the services of a handcar. From El Portal they walked to Bagby, from Bagby to Pleasant Valley and they had left Pleasant Valley a good ways behind when a motor car met them and relieved them of the necessity of further hiking. A gallant railway manager had heard of their plight and hastened to their assistance. They had covered more than half the distance when they were rescued. Which, I submit, was quite a pedestrian feat.

Copied the Gould Wedding Gowns

Would you like to see the gowns worn by Miss Vivien Gould and her six bridesmaids at the recent ceremony in St. Bartholomew's Church, New York? Well, you will have an opportunity to see some of them, not exactly in replica but in very close copies. It has been confided to me, as a great secret of course, that a well known New York modiste was present at the wedding and made careful notes of the gowns worn by the bride and her bridesmaids for the benefit of several of our well known young society girls. The modiste is now having the gowns copied and those who are curious about such matters may look for them at one of the important weddings in the near future. I might tell you the names of the girls but that is a part of the secret which I shall keep in petto.

A Social Housecleaning

Are we to have a social housecleaning? Are the undesirables to be dismissed from the ranks of exclusiveness? I have heard rumors which lead me to believe as much. It is being whispered that some of the dowagers whose word is law are up in arms at the character of some of the men who are welcomed to the smart assemblies and have declared their intention of purging their lists until they contain the names of those men only who are gentlemen in something more than the lax meaning of the term. There have been one or two most unfortunate incidents in society lately which have opened the eyes of the dowagers. They are shocked and they are indignant. They have been asking why this, that and the other man were ever tolerated and they have not received satisfactory replies. They declare, so I am told, that there is altogether too much drinking, too much joy-riding, too much slumming and too many unchaperoned parties among the younger folks. They are determined to put a stop to all this. And as the first step they are going to close their doors to the men who have been the worst offenders. Some of these men they describe as "wolves in sheep's clothing"; they say that they go about seeking whom they may devour. Really, it looks as though we are to have something of a social revolution. Of course it will take place quietly and without scandal. Trust our experienced dowagers for that. Personally I think that this threatened revolution is long overdue.

A Hint for Our Society Men

When the Honorable Seton Robert Beresford arrived in New York to assist at the marriage of his brother, Lord Decies, to Miss Vivian Gould, he met Anthony J. Drexel Jr. and Philip Mills; whereupon the conversation turned on boxing. That was the most natural thing in the world. "Bobbie" Beresford, if we may speak of him familiarly, used to be amateur heavyweight champion of Great Britain; "Tony" Drexel is very handy with the gloves himself; and Philip Mills, while his chief claim to athletic distinction was won as a football player at Harvard, likes a little bout once in a while. So it was speedily arranged that the Britisher should measure his science against the two Americans. The boxing matches, I think, have not yet taken place. But that is neither here nor there. Whether they ever take place is really quite immaterial. The point of the story is in the application of it. And why should we not apply it to local society men? Why should there not be boxers in society as well as dancers, skaters, walkers, riders, golfers, tennis players, poloists and tea-drinkers? The great Queensbury science has been neglected by all our society boys except Walter Hobart and Norbert Shorb. This is a pity. I hope at some not too far distant date to read that "Tempy" Crocker, the Hillsboro Spider, has been matched for a ten round go with "Pete" Martin, the Broadway Slugger; that Kid Grant is to try conclusions with Spike Tobin; and that Clare Payne, the Biffing Bantam, is training for a contest with Johnnie Gallois, the Hope of the White Race. Hoi aristoi and hoi polloi would jostle madly for seats if these bouts were put on publicly. The proceeds might be devoted to a school for teaching society boys good manners. Will Walter Hobart please emerge from his bungalowed seclusion and promote this enterprise?

Among those who were there while the Spreckels' lingered were the Countess Lazzlo Szechenyi (nee Vanderbilt), Lord and Lady Maidstone and the latter's father, Anthony Drexel, the Duchess of Marlborough and Mrs. Robert Goelet. Mr. and Mrs. Spreckels gave a smart dinner party soon after their arrival and some of these distinguished people were their guests.

May Take Some Girls Abroad

I hear that Mrs. Wakefield Baker is thinking of going abroad as chaperon to a small party of young society girls. The mothers of some of the debutantes are thinking the matter over and have not yet given their consent to the project. The girls who have been asked are naturally very enthusiastic and some of them are already dipping into the Baedekers in the family libraries. Mrs Baker started on a cruise of the world with Mr. and Mrs. John D. Spreckels, but before the yachting trip was very far advanced she tired of it and returned home.

An Interesting Wedding

A wedding which should engage the interest of many people in San Francisco and Oakland was that which united Mrs. Arnold Marcus of New York to Lieutenant-Colonel S. Popham Young of the British Army. Mrs. Marcus was formerly Lillian Becket of Oakland. Her husband who was a wealthy banker of the eastern metropolis died some time ago. She has been accustomed to spend a great deal of her time abroad and occasionally one heard rumors that she was going to marry this or that titled foreigner. Lieutenant-Colonel Young has seen service in India and received a C. I. E. from Queen Victoria. The marriage took place in Annapolis where the bride has a son in the Naval Academy. Lieutenant-Colonel and Mrs. Young will go to India in leisurely fashion by way of San Francisco, China and Japan, so Lillian Becket's old friends may look forward to the opportunity of entertaining her at an early date.

A Curious Claim

I have heard it said several times that the Becket family to which Mrs. Popham-Young belongs, claims descent from St. Thomas a Becket, the great Archbishop of Canterbury who was murdered in his cathedral at the behest of King Henry II. I do not imagine that the Becket family makes this claim seriously, for Thomas a Becket was a churchman and a celebate. Mrs. Popham-Young, by the way, makes a notable figure in any assemblage, being six feet tall and possessing a wealth of wonderful Titian hair. Before the death of her first husband she went on the stage, appearing in "The Climbers" with Amelia Bingham under the pseudonym of Miss Goldfinch. In the summer of 1909 the rumors which connected her name with a possible international marriage culminated in the announcement of her engagement to the Earl of Clancarty whose first wife was Belle Bilton. The news caused quite a sensation on both sides of the Atlantic. After some time the match was declared off by the earl and the friends of the lady felt that the reason for this was the lack of a sufficient dower.

Salt Lake Needs a Greenway

Society in Salt Lake has been having a great deal of trouble. During the last season a series of assemblies was given and the management was confronted with so many difficulties not usually found in the rarefied atmosphere of exclusiveness that it is doubtful whether anyone will have the patience and courage to resume the direction next season. From Goodwin's Weekly I extract this account of what happened: "Those who do not know with what these people have had to contend may be surprised to learn how small a large number of so-called society people can be. Ten dollars was the subscription price for four dances, two dollars and a half a dance, and from the very first there were those who criticised the management, found fault with the music, protested because the supper was not a course dinner, and in a hundred other ways made themselves obnoxious. When it was rumored after the second assembly that there would be no more, there was a run on the management equaling in its panicky features a run on a bank, and there were any number who wanted to know what had become of the immense sum of money and demanded their money back in the event that there would be no more dances. Other have gone so far as to ask how much money was made on each dance, and if there was to be a rebate of the undivided profits." The writer suggests that the subscription price be raised next season in order to shut out all the undesirables "who want a premium with each ticket and a house and lot for the main prize." That is a good suggestion, but it does not go to the root of the matter. What Salt Lake wants is a Ned Greenway to rule society with the "mailed fist of the dictator concealed in the velvet glove of the social diplomat."

A New Dance from America

Pavlowa, we have been told, took the "turkey trot" with her from our ocean beach to St. Petersburg with the intention of introducing it into polite society. Now it appears that Paris has acquired an American dance, this time, however, from the southern half of the hemisphere. The latest Paris ballroom novelty is a dance called the "Argentine Tango," which is expected to create a furore and to become extremely popular all over Europe. The new dance originated in the Argentine and Brazilian public dancing halls and then became fashionable. Its rhythm is quite original and may best be described as a cake-walk played adagio, the combination of syncopated time with a slow languorour air being particularly fascinating. The dance is made up of seven figures, the partners taking up their positions as for the Boston. After a few mazurka steps forward the cavalier reclines backwards while the lady bows. The dancers then take several paces sideways in opposite directions, without, however, unclasping hands, accompanied with movements of the arms in cadence with the music. This is followed by a two-step figure, and a repetition of the first figure. The dance is said to be extremely graceful and pretty.

In Arcady and Elsewhere

By Edward F. O'Day

One act only of Arcady is meted out to us by the clever people who composed "The Arcadians." And that's a pity. Arcady, like Heaven, lies about us in our infancy; but gradually it grows indistinct until "the Man perceives it die away and fade into the light of common day." That is just what happens in the "fantastic musical play" at the Columbia. For one act we are beguiled of our civilized predilections. We dwell with the piping shepherds and the dancing shepherdesses. We know naught of money or of buying or selling. We can tell only the truth. We quaff spring water and eat no flesh. We have no marrying or giving in marriage. The faraway modern world is a horrid land of mythical monsters. It looses its feverish grip on our imagination. For the nonce we are free. We live in Arcady where "every shepherd tells his tale under the hawthorne in the dale" and where hunger is amply satisfied with the "herbs and other country messes, which the neat-handed Phyllis dresses." We wear a goatskin and flourish a crook and "sport with Amaryllis in the shade or with the tangles of Neaera's hair." It is all so entrancing, so Dresdeny Chinese! We begin to feel as though we were painted on vases. You see, the reality cannot endure. We are too sophisticated. We grow self-conscious. And so, although at the conclusion of the first act we resign Arcady and all its simplicities with a sincere sigh, we know perfectly well that the return to a disingenuous world is inevitable. Even the authors of "fantastic musical plays" do not dare to keep us in a state of nature for more than one act. They realize too well that we would yawn at the trees and the mossy banks if we were kept too long in Arcady. And so the audience perceives Arcady die away and fade into the light of common "Askwood Race Track, near London." "Towered cities please us then, and the busy hum of men." We are on terra firma once more. The goatskin is abashed before broadcloth, the crook becomes a walking stick and the tangles of Neaera's hair have been metamorphosed to most marvelous puffs. We are comfortable in known surroundings, but a little regretful. In Arcady the nymphs sang their sweetly simple songs to pleasant measures not difficult for the voice; but here at Askwood Race Track there is a deal of pretentious vocalism displayed by wonderfully gowned chorus ladies. The Arcadian maids tripped the light fantastic toe in charming rhythms that out-Allaned Maud. Now we have hobbled beauties cavorting in a sort of glorified sack race. It is a most admirable contrast and carries a satire on the ugliness of our age for which I thank the authors. They do not say to us, "Look here upon this picture and on this," but one may read that injunction into the scheme of their entertainment to the enhancement of one's pleasure. Prisoners that we are to our time and town, we may yet acknowledge that God made Arcady and man made Askwood Race Track. It was a happy thought to place the divine and the human handiwork in juxtaposition. "The Arcadians" is full of happy thoughts interpreted by happy music and by many seemingly happy players. Johnny Osborne is happiest when he forgets to horse-play and Gilbert Childs is happiest when he is most miserable. The hilarity of utter wretchedness, the convulsing mirth of deepest dejection was never better rendered than by Gilbert Childs. He wrings laughter from abject despair and conjures a smile from the empty pocket of gloom. He dissects sorrow and finds it full of joy. Three times three cheers for Gilbert Childs and may he never cheer up! Ruth Thorp is an Arcadian while Alice Russon is an Irish girl. The distinction is negligible. Resorting to an Irish bull for a means of expressing it, we might say that there are no Arcadians and that every Irish girl is an Arcadian at heart. It may or may not be significant in this connection that Arcadian Ruth Thorp wears a costume of corseted constriction while Irish Alice Russon achieves a wonderful freedom of limb, even in her hobble gown, a freedom that is as careless and as fascinating as the freedom an Irishman talks when his landlord is an absentee. The Irish girl really brings us closer to nature. And she sings better, probably because she doesn't try to sing as well. There is an Arcady in her smile, about the only Arcady we poor moderns are permitted to know, except that offered by the first acts of "fantastic musical plays."

Gossip of the Theatre

Pinero's Latest Comedy

Who kissed Josepha? Why, Mr. Panmure, the grotesquely idiotic, ugly, and almost doddering husband of the saintly Mrs. Panmure, who founded the Order of Pure Souls. Josepha, you must know, was little Myrtle Panmure's governess, and little more than a child herself, but the one bright and joyous thing in the melancholy Panmure household. Josepha, so rudely kissed, nearly threw the plates at old Panmure, who was in an agony of remorse immediately after his offence and in a terrible fright lest it should come around to the ears of Mrs. Panmure. But Josepha was too fond of Mrs. Panmure for that. So when, from the girl's evident distress and after some sharp questioning from the ladies of the family, it was elicited from Josepha that she had been violently kissed by some man in the house, she stubbornly refused to say which man. All she could be got to admit was that the man was not Mr. Panmure. Now there were four men in the house, not counting Mr. Panmure—Reginald Stulkeley, M. P. and tariff reformer (great on "cocoa"), Talbot Woodhouse, his private secretary, Mr. Hebblethwaite, an old muff, and Mr. Loring, a young ass. Which of these four was the guilty man? Mrs. Panmure said that the duty of discovering the culprit naturally fell to Mr. Panmure—and so behold the real criminal forced to play the part of judge in a case which he was longing all the time to remove from the cause-list! The jealous doubts of every woman in the house (save Mrs. Panmure) are aroused; the men look at one another askance; the whole place, usually so peaceful and even pious, has become in a trice a kind of Inferno. The scene now shifts to the library, where Mr. Stulkeley, M. P., is dictating his next speech (principally on cocoa) to his private secretary. Little Josepha bursts in on the pair, and entreats one or other of them to assume the guilt for the kiss; for she is weary of being badgered with questions and is afraid that she will be forced to confess the truth. Neither man can rise at first to this height, but the little witch so plays upon their sympathies that it is clear one or other is sure sooner or later to give in. Then follows a droll moment wherein Panmure plays Grand Inquisitor over the two men—who happen to be perfectly aware of his guilt. And then the whole household troops in, and there is a scene of wild confusion, jealousy, recrimination—until at the very height of the storm a small voice is heard—the voice of Mr. Talbot Woodhouse confessing that he was the guilty man. Then, amid the hubbub aroused by this confession, the gong for prayers! They all do their best to smooth their ruffled plumage and troop solemnly out, to the strains of the organ—Mr. Woodhouse decorated by Mrs. Panmure herself, in token of forgiveness, with the Order of Pure Souls. In the final act Stulkeley and Woodhouse are rivals for Josepha's hand, and draw lots as to which shall have the first chance of proposing to her. One of them, Woodhouse, gets his hand stuck in the jar from which the lots are to be drawn. Then, while the other is proposing, Woodhouse peeps through the keyhole and Josepha prods him in the eye with a feather. Then all the Panmure people troop in, to say that the real culprit in this matter of the kiss has confessed (after being found out by the under-footman); and this time you have Mr. Panmure decorated with the Order of Pure Souls—the Third Class of the Order (in copper). Ultimately Josepha marries Stulkeley.

A Memory of Adelaide Neilson

Henry Miller, "reminiscing" about the great actresses with whom he has been associated professionally, places Adelaide Neilson at the head of the list. He says she was "unquestionably the last of the great actresses," which is hardly an intelligible statement. But he tells two interesting stories of her. "I can remember as well as if it were yesterday," says Miller, "the first time I saw the great actress. She appeared as Viola in 'Twelfth Night,' and I was assigned to the role of the sea captain. I watched her closely as she made her first entrance in the second scene of the first act. Her opening line was 'What country, friends, is this?' To which I replied: 'This is Illyria, lady.' Neilson paused for a long moment and gazed about her with eyes that rapidly filled. As she spoke the next line, 'And what should I do in Illyria?' the tears rolled down her cheeks. Of course, tears are not an unusual manifestation on the stage, but I was struck by the fact that she could feel the character from the very moment she stepped forth from the wings." Then he tells this: "When I joined Neilson's company I was quite inexperienced, and made many blunders in my work. The great actress frequently teased me about my mistakes. One night I was standing in the wings chatting with her. The conversation drifted to acting. 'Which of my roles do you like the best?' she asked me. I replied that it would be almost impossible to select just one role. 'Well, in which do you like me the least?' she persisted. After a short pause I answered, 'Juliet.' It was her most famous interpretation, the one on which her great fame was first established, and Neilson gave me a startled glance. 'Why Juliet?' she asked in a curiously altered voice. 'Because,' I stammered, 'you never seem altogether natural in that role.' Neilson was quiet for a moment, and then, 'You are right,' she said, 'perfectly right. Juliet is the one role for which I was laboriously drilled. The others I worked out myself.'"

Selli Simonson is Here

A familiar figure leads the orchestra at the Columbia this week. The wielder of the baton over the musicians who discourse the sweet music written by Lionel Monckton and Howard Talbot for "The Arcadians" is none other than Selli Simonson. Simonson is a Bohemian of the Bohemians and all the good fellows in New York know and like him. He was here not so very long ago and had an unpleasant experience. When the Princess began giving musical shows with Cecilia Rhoda and Zoe Barnett in the principal roles, the management brought Selli Simonson out from New York to direct the orchestra. It happened that a certain local conductor was anxious to sway the baton at the Princess and very much chagrined was he at the appearance of Simonson on the scene. The local conductor is something of a power in the musicians' union, so he took his plaint to headquarters and Simonson was fined one hundred dollars for daring to enter the local field without first obtaining a dispensation from their high mightinesses, the officers of the union. He expressed his opinion of the local conductor in phrases not loud but deep.

Arthur Foote is Coming

Our music lovers will be interested to hear that Arthur Foote, since the death of McDowell the dean of American composers, is going to forsake the classic quietude of Boston and pay a visit to this city in June. He will deliver a number of lectures at the summer school of the University of California and will also be present in the city during July for the Music Teachers' convention. Foote is the author of many fine sonatas, concertos and songs. His Irish folk lore song, "I'm Wearing Awa'" is one of his best known compositions.

"The Midnight Sons" at the Savoy

"The Midnight Sons," superlatively described as the biggest scenic production with the biggest company that has ever been sent on tour, will be the attraction at the Savoy for two weeks, beginning Sunday evening. Lew Fields is the producer. It ran for nearly a year in New York. The cast will be headed by George W. Monroe, the big hit in the original presentation. The company numbers over a hundred people and in addition over two hundred and fifty extra people are employed in the big scenes. An extra matinee will be given on Washington's birthday.

"Madame Sherry" Coming

The second and last week of "The Arcadians" at the Columbia will commence Sunday night. "Madame Sherry," the musical comedy which has scored so great a success in the East and which is already known here through some of its beautiful songs, will be the next attraction, commencing Monday, February 27. In the cast will be Oscar Figman, Dorothy Morton, Lottie Kendall and other well known people.

The Josef Hofmann Concerts

Josef Hofmann, the famous Russian pianist, will give his first concert at the Columbia this Sunday afternoon, presenting a program of exceptional interest. The only evening concert will be given at Christian Science Hall next Thursday night when the offering will consist of masterpieces by Schumann, including the ever welcome "Carnevale," Chopin and Liszt. The farewell program is being specially prepared and will be given at the Columbia on Sunday afternoon, February 26.

"The Battle" at the Alcazar

"The Battle," adapted by Cleveland Moffett from his novel similarly named, will be the Alcazar's offering next week, with Bertram Lytell in the role created by Wilton Lackaye. By the eastern critics "The Battle" has been pronounced a great play. There are four acts and the transformation from tenement squalor to millionaire comfort is cleverly conveyed. All the Alcazar favorites are in the cast.

Bonci, King of Bel-Canto

Alessandro Bonci, the leading lyric tenor at the Metropolitan for the past two seasons, will give two concerts in this city, the dates being Sunday afternoons, March 5 and 12, at the Columbia under the direction of Will. L. Greenbaum. For many years this artist has been a student of song literature and at his concerts we shall hear gems by all the great song writers, as well as operatic selections. Mail orders may be sent to Will. L. Greenbaum at Sherman, Clay & Co's. Bonci will appear in Oakland at Ye Liverty Playhouse on Friday afternoon, March 10.

Tabloid Opera at the Orpheum

A condensed version of "The Tales of Hoffman" in which Miss Helena Frederick will star is a most important number on next week's Orpheum bill. The adaptation contains the most attractive musical numbers of the opera linked together by dialogue. Miss Frederick is said to be a brilliant soprano. "Just Landed" is an Irish musical skit which introduces the comic opera artists, Walter Lawrence and Lillian Fitzgerald. Welch, Mealy and Montrose will present a farcical skit called "Play Ball." Boudini Brothers are "The Wizards of the Accordion." Next week will be the last of Mingonette Kokin, Redford and Winchester and Galetti's Simian Circus. It will also conclude the engagement of Miss Fannie Ward in her comedy "An Unlucky Star."

Ye Liberty Offers "Quincy Adams Sawyer"

Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, has a novelty in store for its patrons next week in "Quincy Adams Sawyer," the play made from the well-known novel of that title. It has been a successful attraction on the road for many years, being a most entertaining picture of rural life. After one week of "Quincy Adams Sawyer" with a special holiday matinee on Wednesday, the Bishop Players will present "The Right of Way" for the first time in stock.

A member of the faculty of a new England university tells of a freshman, who was asked by one of the professors whether he had proved a certain proposition in Euclid.

"Well, sir," responded the freshman, "'proved' is a strong word. But I will say that I have rendered it highly probable.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The stock market in the recent week has been one of marking-time tendency with profit taking in spots by those who bought at lower prices some time ago. There has been nothing illogical in the halt in the upward trend which has anticipated for the moment the betterment in most lines of industry. It would seem unwise not to prevent speculation, temporarily at least, in view of the many important market events that are pending. An extra session of Congress as a result of the non-passing of the Canadian reciprocity bill would be a severe blow at Wall Street and as for other important features that would affect securities momentarily, there is the Harriman merger decision which will be down any day now. Hence the spirit of conservatism among the leading bankers seems opportune. Decisions in the railway rate cases may be looked for this month and the best opinion among the railway men is that fair increases will be given the eastern roads and that a readjustment will occur west of the Mississippi that will give justice to the shipper and the railroad alike. We look for a continuance of stability in Wall Street values with possible moderate setbacks.

Wheat—Reciprocity talk was the chief item of interest in the wheat market the past week and as a result of the President's firm stand sentiment became decidedly bearish and the market suffered a sharp decline, with only a slight rally from the low point. The northwestern markets led in the decline and a good deal of the selling came from there, as reciprocity would mean more to the northwestern markets than to any others. Nearly all the wheat grown in Canada is of the spring wheat variety and would be taken by the big milling concerns at Minneapolis. Notwithstanding the small receipts the past week, stocks of wheat continue to pile up and at Kansas City over five million bushels are in storage with only a limited demand. Consumers are buying from hand to mouth and mills are running on short time. Drought talk in the extreme southwest has been somewhat relieved but a good soaking rain would be of great benefit just now, as the new wheat is just beginning to show itself in some localities. Foreign news has also been against the price. Continued large shipments from Russia, India, Australia and Argentine forced the English market down and it does not look as if there is much chance of any export sales from this country, our market at present being 6 cents out of line from a shipping basis. Liquidation has been on a large scale the past week and it is only reasonable to expect a good rally from present prices due to an oversold condition, but the tendency of the market seems downward and until something in the way of a crop scare developes prices will undoubtedly go very much lower.

Corn—The corn market has ranged lower despite the wet weather over the corn belt with its prospect of delaying marketings by producers. The weakness in wheat and the lack of material demand for cash corn were also important factors. There is some talk in Chicago of large export sales of corn but they cannot be verified. Most of the Chicago exporters and shippers say that their bids are a half cent below cost. There does not seem to be very much in the market either way and a dull scalping market will probably be in order until something develops that will take the market out of its rut.

Cotton—The continuance of heavy receipts and private reports of beneficial rains in sections of north, central and west Texas have kept the trade in a very bearish mood the past week and as a result prices have been on the down grade with prospects of going lower still next week The weakness in the English markets was also an added bear factor, prices declining steadily with reports of a poor demand from spinners and talk of further curtailment due to the poor trade with China. It is said that the plague in China continues to spread, that 200,000 people have already perished from it and that millions more are threatened with starvation. The continued decline in bar silver to 23 11-16d. in London would seem to confirm the deplorable state of health and general conditions in China due to the plague, floods and famine. Prospects for good trade with the far east do not look promising in the circumstances. Manchester quotes cloth buyers holding off and cotton yarns are said to be easier. Spot cotton in the south has held up remarkably well considering the drop in futures but there was a show of weakness at the close of the week. Exporters are said to be out of the market at present and with so much curtailment going on in this country, the demand is large enough to take care of the movement The much talked of let-up in receipts failed to materialize and receipts are still running ahead of last year which would indicate a much larger crop than was estimated by the Government. It looks like a lower cotton market to us and we favor sales on any slight advance brought about by short covering.

"Do you see that fellow over there yelling 'Kill the umpire!' 'Cut his heart out!' and 'The bloody robber!'?"

"Of course, I see him and hear him, too."

"Well, he's one of the worst henpecked men in town. He comes out here every afternoon to let off steam."

Countess Sofia Andreevna Tolstoi has communicated to the Novoe Vremya the copy of a letter written by her late husband thirteen years ago and marked: "Unless I leave directions to the contrary, this letter is to be handed to S. A. after my death." It effectually disposes of all speculation as to the motives of Tolstoi's flight from Yasnaya Poliana. The letter is as follows:

Dear Sonia—Long have I been tormented by the discord between my life and my beliefs. To compel you all to change your life, the habits to which I myself had accustomed you, I could not; and to leave you ere this I also could not, believing that I would deprive the children while they were little of that small influence which I could have over them, and would grieve you; on the other hand, to continue to live as I have lived these sixteen years struggling and irritating you or falling myself under those influences and temptations to which I had become accustomed and by which I am surrounded I also cannot, and I have now decided to do what I have long wished to do: go away, because, first, for me, in my advancing years, this life becomes more and more burdensome and I long more and more for solitude; and, secondly, because the children have grown up, my influence is not needed, and you all have livelier interests which will render my absence little noticeable.

The chief thing is that just as the Hindus nearing sixty retire into the woods, and as old religious men seek to devote their last years to God and not to jokes, puns, gossip, or tennis, so for me, entering my seventieth year, the all soul-absorbing desire is for tranquility, for solitude, and, if not for entire harmony, at least not for crying discord between my life and my beliefs and conscience.

If I did this openly there would be entreaties, pleadings, criticism, quarrels, and I might weaken perhaps and not fulfil my decision—yet it must be fulfilled. And so, pray forgive me if my act causes you pain, and, above all, in your soul, Sonia, leave me free to go and do not repine or condemn me.

That I should have gone away from you does not mean that I am displeased with you. I know that you could not—literally could not—and cannot see and feel as I do, and therefore could not and cannot change your life and sacrifice yourself for something which you do not recognize. And therefore I do not blame you, but on the contrary recall with love and gratitude the long thirty-five years of our life, especially the first half of this period, when you, with the maternal devotion of your nature, so firmly and energetically bore that which you considered to be your duty. You have given me and the world what you could give. You have given great motherly love and devotion, and you cannot but be prized for that. But, during the last period of our life—the last fifteen years—we have drifted asunder. I cannot think that I am to blame, because I know that I have changed, not for myself nor for other people's sake, but because I could not otherwise. Neither can I blame you that you did not follow me, but thank and lovingly remember and shall continue to remember you for what you gave me.

Good-bye, dear Sonia,

June 8-21, 1897. Your loving Leo Tolstoi.

A DAINTY TOILET ARTICLE

Every lady who desires to keep up her attractive appearance, while at the Theatre, attending Receptions, when shopping, while traveling and on all occasions should carry in her purse a booklet of Gouraud's Oriental Beauty Leaves. This is a dainty little booklet of exquisitely perfumed powdered leaves which are easily removed and applied to the skin. It is invaluable when the face becomes moist and flushed and is far superior to a powder puff as it does not spill and soil the clothes.

It removes dirt, soot and grease from the face, imparting a cool delicate bloom to the complexion. Sent anywhere on receipt of 10 cents in stamps or coin. F. T. Hopkins, 37 Great Jones St., New York.

The Penny in Trade Circles

"Got any pennies?" inquired a sad-eyed man of philosophic bent, addressing the paying teller of one of San Francisco's leading banking establishments.

"Pennies!" exclaimed the paying teller, "this is not the cold, calculative East; this is the warm-hearted, generous West. Pennies! You will find pennies, and plenty of them perhaps, after you fly over the Sierras, cross the Rockies and swim the Missouri, but not till then. We have yet to learn, and yet to practice in our commercial life on the coast, the subtle process of splitting hairs."

"That is perhaps true up to the present. But you know they are talking of reducing freight rates."

"Yes; I know they are talking about tons and carload rates and ton-miles, but that is the same old magnifying glass used by the office hunter and profit hunter to deceive the consumer. You may cut your car load rate or ton rate in two and the consumer will derive no benefit. What is it that the consumer buys by the car load or ton? Is it sugar, flour, butter, fruit, groceries, eggs, clothing, shoes?"

"No," said the sad-eyed man reflectively, "that is where I thought the penny would come in. I know that the dealers will profit by cuts in carload and less-than-carload rates, but I have thought that maybe the consumer might get some of it, too."

"How? The San Francisco consumer, we will say, buys a dozen of eggs. The rate on eggs from Petaluma is about one-tenth of one cent a dozen. How will a cut in rates help him. The freight charge on a suit of clothes from the Atlantic seaboard to San Francisco is about 19 cents, on a hat one and one-half cents, on an overcoat 15 cents and on a pair of shoes about 5½ cents. If these rates were cut in two, how much do you suppose would be left for the consumer after the various jobbers, commission brokers and dealers got theirs. The trouble with you, my friend, is that, like many others, you do not look into these things from the proper angle. Viewing from the dealer's standpoint in tons and carloads is one thing; viewing it from that of the consumer in pounds and single articles is quite another. It does not necessarily follow—indeed it is seldom true—that rate reductions that are beneficial to the dealer are also beneficial to the consumer. The consumer's welfare is always present and uppermost in the reasons put forth for reducing rates, but it is also always absent and lost sight of when it comes to dividing the benefits. I'll admit, my friend, if any part of the benefit from rate reductions was to go to the consumer, the demand for pennies would be active, for his share would rarely get above that denomination, but the consumer is merely a shield or curtain behind which designing minds hide themselves while plotting against the object of attack. The real motive behind this attack on rates is not to benefit the consumer. The consumer's welfare is a myth."

The Editor Regrets

"When I was city editor of the Virginia City Enterprise," remarked Mark Twain at a dinner in New York, "a fine turkey was one day left at the office. Turkeys were rare in that high altitude, and we all hankered after this bird. The proprietor, though, claimed it for his own. He took it home and had it cooked for dinner. The next day, as he was expatiating on the turkey's richness and tenderness, a letter was handed to him. He opened it and read:

"'Mr. Editor:

"'Sir—Yesterday I sent you a turkey which has been the cause of much dispute among us. To settle a bet, will you kindly ask your agricultural editor to state in tomorrow's issue what it died of.'"

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 33,623, Department No. 10.

MAUD GRANGER, Plaintiff, vs. ALFRED GRANGER, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California Send Greeting to: Alfred Granger, defendant.

You are hereby directed to appear and answer the complaint in an action entitled as above brought against you in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, within ten days after the service on you of this summons—if served within this City and County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere.

And you are hereby notified that unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the complaint.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 33,681, Dept. No. 10.

PLINY E. RITNER, Plaintiff, vs. GRACE I. RITNER, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, Send Greeting to: Grace I. Ritner, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion of plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 18th day of January, A. D. 1911. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

Letters

"A Winter Queen"

"Marie Hay" is a name which has appeared before on a title page. It will be remembered as the pen name of the author of "A German Pompadour," a volume which went into a second edition not very long ago. "Marie Hay" is really the Baroness Herbert von Hindenburg and she is very well known in the diplomatic circles of The Hague where she resides. Though the author has called "A Winter Queen" a romance, it probably contains as much fact, and it is certainly more convincingly presented, than nine-tenths of the so-called biographies of royal personages. "The Winter Queen" was that daughter of James I of England, Elizabeth Stuart, who in 1613 became the wife of Frederich, Prince Palatine, with his capital at Heidelburg. The recital opens with a description of the preparations for the reception of the English princess, the pomp and ceremony, the decorations, the stately procession and the feasting and dancing. Frederich was a courtly cavalier and very much in love with his beautiful wife, the "Pearl of England," and Elizabeth seems to have possessed a full share of that charm of the ill-fated Stuart race which made loyal friends and partisans and kept them despite misfortune and ill-requite. The few years spent at Heidelburg passed quietly enough despite the trivial disputes over precedence, for James I insisted that his daughter should claim the first place on all occasions, deeming that her rank as Princess Royal of Great Britain had not been reduced by the fact of her marriage with a mere Elector Palatine. Even a casual acquaintance with the Stuart character would prove how little likely she was to forego any of her royal prerogatives. Indeed this second Elizabeth appears to have had a full share of her great namesake's imperiousness, though happily none of her temper. Frederich was ambitious. He would have liked full well to sit on a royal throne, but still better, to see his beloved wife enthroned The political situation of Europe was like a seething pot, and when the throne of Bohemia was offered to him he eagerly accepted it, despite the wise advice of his mother who cautioned him to be content with the fair land of his inheritance and the loyal regard of his subjects. Nor was he altogether to blame, for at first he had the assurance of the support of the Protestant princes and it was not unreasonable in him to expect the assistance of his royal father-in-law, James I of England. The flattering assurances which hailed Frederich and Elizabeth as the hope of the Protestant cause, the leaders in that combined front to be presented to the Holy Roman Empire in the person of the Emperor Fedinand of Austria, was soon withdrawn, for, in an age when successful treachery was almost a military virtue, and the victors spared neither age nor sex, persons nor property, it was a desperate undertaking to invite the wrath of the strong. Elizabeth Stuart craved the excitement of change and perhaps it was only natural that she should long to be crowned queen. The ill-fated journey was undertaken, though neither of the royal pair had a word of the Czech language, not even the few complimentary phrases that might have been parroted for the formal occasions. There was no official Bohemian advisor in their train and they knew absolutely nothing of the customs or apparently even the history of their new subjects, so that the symbolic observances, the traditional rites which should have impressed them as solemn functions were taken to be jests and the ill timed merriment of king and court, the half understood humors of the queen, struck a discordant note in the beginning. The pompous arrogance with which Frederich repelled the kindly hints and advice of those of the Bohemian nobles who tried to correct his errors only added to the difficulty. Though Frederich was tendered the crown of Bohemia with the understanding that he would espouse the cause of all his Protestant subjects it soon became evident that he was under the influence of the narrowest of advisors and that the mild Lutherans were to be as much anathema as the hated Catholics. The Thirty Years' War was, in fact, a three-sided contest in which Calvinist and Lutheran were as much opposed to each other as either was to their avowed enemy, but the iconoclasm of Frederich's German court followers alienated even the Protestants who were averse to seeing works of art dear to them through the association of centuries, wantonly destroyed. In less than a year's time from the date when they set out so joyously from Heidelberg, the court of Bohemia was in flight from its capital. The army which figured so largely on paper, starving, naked and untrained, had nearly melted away. Famine and disease had claimed a share; the generals, drawing pay per capita from the treasury, had omitted mention of desertions and deaths and the soldiers had mutinied or resolved themselves into bands of desperadoes, preying upon the country to support life. Virtually there was no army but such as it was, each regiment had its own commander who refused to recognize any other as his superior. Frederich was unable to cope with the situation. "The grey mare was the better horse." The retreat from Prague was a flight in which the queen's pet monkey found place in the royal coach. The queen's baby was dropped by its careless nurse and almost forgotten. Elsewhere we may read of the march of armies, of Wallenstein and Tilley and the catalogue of encounters, the alliances formed and dissolved, the new interests which protracted the struggle and the final end of it all, but here we are concerned only with the royal household, driven from one home but cut off by intervening armies from reaching the other; denied hospitality and shelter even in the direst need and seeing those who befriended them despite the proscription stripped of honors and lands and driven forth themselves, a pitiful band. They had neither present means of support nor definite expectations for the future and when at last they found refuge at The Hague, it was for Elizabeth the beginning of an exile of more than thirty years. At first it was expected that the fortunes of war would change and the Bohemian kingdom be rewon; later it was hoped that soon they would "go home" to the Palatinate, but finally Frederich died, as much in despair as of disease. All the gay young courtiers who had worn Elizabeth's colors and all the staid or fiery advisors vanished, victims of battle, pestilence or inhumanity. After long years of poverty sustained on a scanty income voted by the Staats-General or wrung from the English treasury, Elizabeth Stuart lived to see the royal family of Great Britain exiled and to extend such hospitality as she could command to her nephew who afterward ruled as Charles II. Her own large family was small comfort to her for the sons condemned, by their pretentions to a life of idleness, became for the most part turbulent roysterers and there was little sympathy between her and her daughters. After the Restoration an old woman nearing the scriptural limit of age, Elizabeth Stuart, once the beloved Princess Royal, turned her eyes toward her early home, but Nephew Charles, forgetting the ceremony and hospitality with which he was received during his own exile, despatched a messenger all the way to Delfthaven to bear a message telling her not to make the journey and when, disregarding the injunction, she took ship, he allowed her to land without a greeting and waited two days before he condescended to call upon her. Though old, friendless and penniless, it was still within her power to awaken romantic attachment and though it was only for the sake of the lawful protection and assistance it provided, this woman, born a princess royal and at one time a crowned queen, was married at last to a youth no older than some of her own children, the son of a London merchant, though he had won by his deeds of gallantry a title of his own. Though Elizabeth Stuart and Frederich, Prince Palatine, were pitifully young, according to our modern standards, judging them by their own generation they cannot be said to have been handicapped by lack of years. The task that Frederich essayed was too great for his capacity; and lack of means with which to maintain a family, much less an army, in those times when whole commands could be bought off to serve the cause with the longest purse, seems to have militated against him as seriously as lack of the magnetism which makes and holds a following for even a forlorn hope. It is a grievous commentary on all his pretentions that there is not even a tradition to point to the place of his burial. Elizabeth Stuart was a courageous woman gifted with a sense of humor which, if sometimes ill-timed, yet helped her to tide over many a situation fraught with tragedy, but when one reads of the anxieties, the poverty, the importunities for means with which to sustain existence—plain beggary, however disguised—and most of all, that numerous and unsatisfactory procession of children, one is prone to ask, Who would be a queen? and whether it would have required a little more or a little less courage to have abandoned the unsatisfactory role. It will detract nothing from the interest in "A Winter Queen"—whose court vanished before the army of the empire like snow before the spring sun—to recall that there is still a small band of romantic "Legitimists" who hold that whatsoever there is to the "divine right" in royalty is still vested in her descendants who should have been preferred to William and Mary after the Revolution of 1688. The map which forms the "end pieces" is a great assistance to the reader. Illustrations, of which there are five, are reproductions of the royal pair by different artists. Marie Hay has given us an uncommonly interesting relation, whether it be romance or history or both. From Houghton, Miffilin & Co.

Auto Notes

Among the local motorists who have recently taken deliverey of 1911 Pope-Hartford cars are Rolla V. Watt, manager of the Royal and Queen Insurance Companies, and Mr. Sinsheimer, president of Sinsheimer & Co., wholesale dealers in grains and beans. Mr. Watt took a foredoor pony tonneau and Mr. Sinsheimer a foredoor five-passenger touring car. The Consolidated Motor Car Company also reports that a Pope-Hartford has just been shipped to Sacramento and two to Visalia.

The Cartercar Auto Co. reports the delivery of four passenger Cartercars to Chas. Missen of Livermore and E. H. Gerber of San Francisco.

The past two years, according to Mr. Sanford of Sydney, New South Wales, have seen a decided growth of demand in Australia for American made machines. Mr. Sanford closed with the Chalmers Motor Company a few months ago for the Chalmers agency in his corner of the world.

According to advices received by the Pioneer Automobile Company, the Lozier Co. of New York tendered the third annual dinner to their dealers on the Saturday evening marking the closing of the Madison Square Garden Show. Over forty Lozier dealers coming from all parts of the country attended the festivities.

William K. Vanderbilt Jr. probably heard more about the Hudson "33" during the auto show at Madison Square Garden than any other person who visited the exhibit. The noted sportsman and railway magnate always visited the show in company with William E. Hoyt, chief engineer of the New York Central's legal department. Mr. Hoyt is a great admirer of the Howard L. Coffin designing skill and purchased a Hudson "33" a few days before the show.

"Careful driving," says C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of the Diamond Rubber Company, "means a big saving always in tire expense. Remember among other things to turn the corners slowly. So many people seem to think the moment they get a car it is their solemn duty to see how fast they can go and how much the car will stand on every occasion. High speed is most disastrous on tires. That is so plain it needs no explanation. Then worst of all is the turning of corners rapidly when the very laws of nature throw the entire weight of the car at accumulated momentum to the outside and pull sidewise on the walls of the tires. No wonder such drivers have tire trouble. You might just as well put the tread of your tires against an emery wheel as to turn corners at a high rate of speed."

The Motor Sales Company of California has just received a supply of 1911 Inter-State catalogues. These catalogues are handsomely illustrated and finished throughout in most elegant manner. The specifications of the entire 1911 line, including the five passenger torpedo, the interchangeable coupe and roadster and the seven passenger 50 horsepower touring car, are given.

The Haynes Auto Sales Company has just unloaded another shipment of 5 passenger foredoor touring cars. Reported sales of this model would indicate that the car is among the most popular of the 1911 types to appear on the local market.

Among the aviators who used Monogram Oil during the meet at Selfridge Field was Hubert Latham whose flights in his Antoinette Monoplane were the features of the early days of the meet.

"In September, 1908, we put a Diamond casing on a "30" five passenger car which we use in the rent service," says Mr. A. W. Marksheffel of the Colorado Automobile and Supply Co. of Colodaro Springs. "This tire was on the right front wheel and gave 23,000 miles' service."

To such a fine point has the design of the Stevens-Duryea been carried, that the experimental development staff of the Chicopee Falls works has searched for improvements during the whole year, and has only produced two or three features to which the public eye can be directed and which will be readily recognized as distinct advances.

Rambler Builds Fire Truck

Fire department chiefs, public service officials and the most experienced employes of municipalities in the country will find a receptive market for the knowledge they have gained in years of fire fighting and other duties with the rapid development of the service motor car as a money saving aid to cities.

The Thomas B. Jeffery Company, makers of Rambler Service Cars, have been the first to command the experience of the most efficient fire fighters in the country in the production of a combination chemical and hose truck, exhibited for the first time this year at the Chicago commercial vehicle show.

In a booklet just issued, describing the development of the Rambler Service Cars, the results of the combined experience of these experts are shown. This booklet is being sent free to all members of city councils, fire departments, hospital staffs and boards of directors of public institutions.

Starting Right

In every important suburb of London you will find at least one big provision shop bearing the name of Blank and Dash, Ltd. They are all controlled from a central office, and the various staffs are shifted about also. Now to the merry jest. T'other day a charming lady cashier was transferred from, say, North Hampstead to West Norwood. She entered the latter branch, walked straight into the cash desk, hung up her coat and hat, and then went to the manager.

"I suppose," she asked, "we start the day the same here as at Hampstead?"

"M'yes, I suppose so," answered the manager, silghtly puzzled

"Come on, then, give me a kiss and a hug and let me get to work!"

"The directors of the road were a precious lot of grafters."

"You don't say so!"

"Yes; every last man of them had his appendix removed, and charged the cost to operating expenses."

Degenerate Uncle Sam

The flapdoodle press is taking seriously the jocular observation of the Hon. "Champ" Clark that the annexation of Canada may take place in the not distant future. This is the consummation of which the Fourth of July orator had instinctive prescience in the days long agone when all good citizens fondly believed that the eyes of the world were upon them and felt that it was their duty as a people to teach mankind the way of republican righteousness by the beneficent influence of example. Those were the days when we pointed with pride to our free institutions and gloried in the success that vindicated the truth and efficiency of the democratic theory of government. Those were the days when we all believed that Gladstone paid no more than a simple and honest tribute to the genius of the Founders when he said, "The American Constitution is, so far as I can see, the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." But those days of national self-complacency and pride are gone. And with them are gone the prospect of the shelter of the stars and stripes being sought by the people of Canada. By reciprocity we may establish closer trade relations with our neighbors of the north, but if there is to be any merging of the two peoples under one form of government that form will not be the one under which we are living. Why the very suggestion of their being made American citizens fills the people of Canada with rage and horror. And is it not easy to appreciate their state of mind with reference to republican institutions which, from the beginning of the world have but served to prove the futility of the principle in which they are grounded? Why should the people of Canada, enjoying as they are the blessings of individual liberty and the protection of institutions that are safe from the depredations of the mob, desire to shake off their allegiance to England? They have no complaint to make against the mother country, and certainly there is nothing to fascinate or allure in the workings of our government. On the contrary when they ponder the phenomena of American politics, the abuses that have arisen, the wild and destructive theories of government that are growing in popularity, the tyranny of a vulgar and besotted press, the unscruposity and ignorance of the idols of the masses, they ought to felicitate themselves on having so close at hand a horrible example of misgovernment to warn them against the folly of indulging the mischievous spirit of discontent.

The Press and Its Puppets

That this is rapidly becoming a government by the press is apparent to every man who pays the slightest attention to the psychology of political events. Our public servants with few exceptions are the puppets of the press. Eager for the popularity which the press guarantees and fearful of the hostility that is fatal to political ambition they are responsive to every suggestion made by the tyrants of the tripod. The real bosses in every State and in every city are newspaper editors, and their puppets in office are ever ready to gratify their desire whether it be communicated publicly through editorial columns or privately in editorial sanctum; whether it be for the support of some new-fangled theory of government or for the advancement of a corrupt journal's private interests. How subservient to the autocratic press of this State are the representatives of the people is shown by the smothering at Sacramento of the bill providing for the reduction of the exorbitant rates charged for the publishing of delinquent tax notices. That bill was smothered at the behest of the grafters of the rural press, nine-tenths of whom are conducting "reform" journals and molding public opinion against the courts and in favor of increasing the powers of the mob. It was smothered by a "reform" Legislature, the members of which are clamoring for a better quality of justice in California. Cant and hypocrisy are surely having their inning in this State.

Our Subsidized Magazines

President Taft is now having a tussle with the magazine section of the press. The magazine editors are in a terrible rage because the President has deemed it wise in the interest of economy to raise the postal rates on second-class mail. The magazine business has been revolutionized in this country in the last ten years. Formerly it was considered to be the chief function of the magazines to edify and instruct. Now it is their chief function to promote publicity for the big mail-order houses of the East. The magazines now serve the purpose of keeping those houses in touch with their customers, and they have greatly reduced the output of catalogues which were formerly the means by which mail-order houses stimulated business. The consequence is that the magazines contain an enormous amount of advertising matter, the transportation of which costs the people many millions of dollars annually. Now these magazines are violating the spirit of the postal laws. It is distinctly a violation of those laws to send through the mails at the second-class rate a magazine for which no charge is made. Free magazines have been forbidden the press privilege ever since a certain shrewd business man made a great success of one by distributing it broadcast and thus commanding an enormous advertising patronage with the assistance of the post-office and at the expense of the people. He was put out of business by a rule excluding from the privilege of the second-class rate magazines that have not bona fide subscribers. But the publishers evade the spirit of this rule by giving away premiums to subscribers and agents. Theirs is a new system of rebating. The cost of selling some of the magazines is greater than the revenue derived from sales. And in some instances the rebating is managed by a system of book-selling. So the truth is that few of the magazines have a legitimate circulation; that is, a circulation due to intrinsic merit. The publishers are conducting a gigantic advertising enterprise with the aid of the government which subsidizes them by transporting their magazines at a rate far below the actual cost. President Taft has called a halt, but it remains to be seen whether he will be able to compel the publishers to take their hands out of the national treasury; whether a courageous Administration is able to cope with the power of the press.

When Doctors Disagree

Common sense, it has been said, is of all kinds the most uncommon. To be sure it is nothing more than the knack of seeing things as they are and doing things as they ought to be done, but this is a rare gift not to be acquired in school or college. How often do we meet men with learning who have not the common sense to apply it! We meet them in the professions practicing sciences and we say to ourselves, How true that a little learning is a dangerous thing! For there can be no complete apprehension of the principles of any science where there is lack of common sense. And it is certainly a perilous thing to vest with authority men who can never have more than a little learning; perilous to the State to make lawyers of nincompoops; perilous to society to give a medical diploma to every Sangrado who has memorized a few text-books. As to the perilousness of this last mentioned practice, how well was it illustrated at the meeting of the County Medical Society last week when Dr. Schafer's new "anti-fever serum" was the subject of discussion! How many of the men who participated in that discussion are qualified to prescribe for the sick; to decide whether a capital operation should or should not be performed? They were asked merely to investigate the serum by scientific methods, and they squabbled for an hour and failed to accomplish anything. Yet it appears that this serum is being administered indiscriminately. Some remarkable cures were reported and some quick deaths. Perhaps the deaths are to be accounted for on the hypothesis that the serum was administered in what are known as terminal cases. If so it was administered contrary to the instructions of Dr. Schafer, and if such be the case it is all the more reason why the medical profession should seek enlightenment. Yet the doctors of the County Medical Society who are supposed to be devoted to the interests of science and eager for the ascertainment of truth adjourned without determining what should be done. If science, as some one has said, is nothing more than trained and organized common sense there appears to be a woful lack of it in the medical fraternity.

A Banker's Grave Offense

Mr. Frank B. Anderson, President of the Bank of California, lectured at the State University the other day on "Morals in Trade and Commerce," and we are told by the Boughten Bulletin, organ and pet journal of the devotees of mob rule, that he spoke in great contempt of "popular majorities, legislatures and everything popular" including "magazines and newspapers that are ruled by majorities." The whole account of the lecture was obviously designed to incite against Mr. Anderson the indignation of everybody who believes as the editor of the Boughten Bulletin pretends that he believes—that the masses are sacred and anything said in disparagement of them is blasphemy. The editor of the Boughten Bulletin is on one of his periodical jags. He has been filling his skin with the red inflammatory liquor which is distilled from the intoxicating weed of self-conceit that has its roots in political power. In his delirium he fancies that the time is ripe for another reign of terror similar to the one that was conducted by Detective Burns when the town was alive with gumshoe pimps and parasites. As though the halcyon day were already at hand he is running amuck, spurting venom at every object of his hatred, and rousing the populace by raging against individuals that dare voice opinions on public questions contrary to his own. It was this uproarious editor who demanded the recall of Senator Works for disapproving the proposal to subject the judiciary to mob rule, and it was in the same spirit that he characterized the appearance of Banker Anderson on the lecture platform at Berkeley as an invasion of the university by "Big Business." In the same spirit he appealed to popular passion by printing as a summary of the speech a barefaced distortion of the speaker's sentiments. Mr. Anderson, it is true, warned the students of the university against the whims of popular caprice, advised them not to regard public clamor as infallible, but he did not speak contemptuously of anybody or anything. But suppose he had done so; is it lese majesty to speak disrespectfully of the people in these days when one may speak as disrespectfully of a king as of the equator and with equal disregard of consequences? Here, of course, the people are the sovereign power, but are we to deify the multitude? Are they already so drunk with power that as in the days of Marius it means heads off for those who would censure them for their blind adoration of their blatant demagogues? "He spoke contemptuously of the people!" says Fremont Older, with hands upraised in holy horror. Well why not speak contemptuously of the people? If the Boughten Bulletin, edited by Fremont Older, is the mouthpiece of any great number of the people, surely that alone should be sufficient reason to speak contemptuously of them.

The Dear People

The people have been spoken of disrespectfully and contemptuously from time immemorial and by men greater than Mr. Anderson of the Bank of California, greater and more beloved even by the people today than any of our contemporary leaders of the people. They have been spoken of contemptuously for the reason that it is characteristic of them to tolerate as leaders men as devoid of intellectual honesty as, for example, the editor of the Boughten Bulletin. And as they will continue to be spoken of contemptuously it may be well at this time, coddled as they are by flatterers of the mountebank and whited sepulchre type to introduce them to the society of old friends that they may learn just what has been thought of the dear deluded people, of popularity and the priests of Demos:

Popular opinion is the greatest lie in the world.—Carlyle.

Seek not the favor of the multitude; it is seldom got by lawful means.—Kant.

The vulgar and common esteem is seldom happy in hitting right.—Montaigne.

The greatness of a popular character is less according to the ratio of his genius than the sympathy he shows with the prejudices and even the absurdities of his time.—Lamartine.

Put as little trust in the people as in princes.—Edmund Burke: Letter to John Bourke, July 11, 1777.

It is humiliating for us who form the mass of mankind that the people furnish the most detestable examples of wickedness and phrenzy in the tyrannic abuse of power.—Edmund Burke: Letter to Count d'Artois, Nov. 6, 1793.

The scum that rises upmost when the nation boils.—Dryden.

In every age the vilest specimens of human nature are to be found among demagogues.—Macaulay: History of England.

You common cry of curs! whose breath I hate
As reek o' the rotten fens, whose loves I prize
As the dead carcases of unburied men.
—Shakespeare.

There have been many great men that have flattered the people, who ne'er loved them, and there be many that they have loved, they know not wherefore: so that, if they love they know not why, they hate upon no better ground. Therefore, for Coriolanus neither to care whether they love or hate him manifests the true knowledge he has in their disposition, and, out of his noble carelessness, lets them plainly see't.—Shakespeare.

Our slippery people,
Whose love is never linked to the deserver
Till his deserts are past.
—Shakespeare.

The mutable, rank-scented many.
—Shakespeare.

The blunt monster with uncounted heads,
The still discordant wavering multitude.
—Shakespeare.

Your affections are
A sick man's appetite, who desires most that Which would increase evil.
—Shakespeare.

A usurping populace is its own dupe, a mere underworker and a purchaser in trust for some single tyrant.—Swift.

The cities fell often under tyrannies which spring naturally out of popular government.—Swift.

All, too, will bear in mind this sacred principle, that though the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail, that will to be rightful, must be reasonable.—Thomas Jefferson: Inaugural address.

Lycurgus being asked why he, who in other respects appeared to be so zealous for the equal rights of men did not make his government democratic rather than oligarchic, replied, "Go you and try a democracy in your own house."—Plutarch.

If there were a people consisting of gods, they would be governed democratically; so perfect a government is not suitable to men.—Rousseau.

That is, in a great degree, true of all men, which was said of the Athenians, that they were like sheep, of which a flock is more easily driven than a single one.—Whately.

In every village then will arise some miscreant to establish the most grinding tyranny by calling himself the people.—Sir Robert Peel.

In a free and republican government you cannot restrain the voice of the multitude. Every man will speak as he thinks, or, more properly, without thinking, and consequently will judge of effects without attending to their causes.—George Washington.

The public wishes itself to be managed like a woman; one must say nothing to it except what it likes to hear—Goethe.

As inclination changes, thus ebbs and flows the unstable tide of public judgment.—Schiller.

Public sentiment ought to signify the common march of good men's thoughts, and should be but a road, marked plain that all may know the way to travel. But too often it is employed as a bribe to stop free-thinking, an intimidation to check free-acting, a bauble to lure approbation, or a threatened fool's-cap with which to terrify it.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The charge which may with justice be brought against the common people is, not that they are inconstant, but that they almost invariably choose their favorite so ill that their constancy is a vice and not a virtue.—Macaulay: History of England.

Those who have foregone that pleasing adviser, and given up their minds to the slavery of every popular impulse, I sincerely pity: I pity them still more if vanity leads them to mistake the shouts of a mob for the trumpet of fame. Experience might inform them that many who have been saluted with the huzzas of a crowd one day and received its execrations the next; and many who, by the fools of their own times, have been held up as spotless patriots, have, nevertheless, appeared on the historian's page, when truth triumphed over delusion, the assassins of liberty.—Lord Chief-Justice Mansfield.

From the foregoing excerpts it must be clear enough that Mr. Anderson of the Bank of California, if he has no superstitious reverence for the people, no disposition to regard them as infallible and no admiration for the press and demagogues that coddle and caress them, it can at least be said of him that he is in mighty good company.

The Monk

I go with silent feet and slow
As all my black-robed brothers go;
I dig a while and read and pray,
So portion out my pious day
Until the evening time, and then
Work at my book with cunning pen.

If she would turn to me a while,
If she would turn to me and smile,
My book would be no more to me
Than some forgotten phantasy,
And God no more unto my mind
Than a dead leaf upon the wind.

Imaginary Eloquence

Being Excerpts from Some Notable Arguments Delivered in the Year of the World's Fair Before Courts Governed by the Salutary Recall in the Progressive Metropolis of the Golden West

(As Reported by Theodore Bonnet)

Your Honor has listened with wonderful patience to counsel for plaintiff who has quoted many authorities in support of his client's cause. He has expatiated at great length on the law and the evidence, but he has absolutely ignored the merits of the case. I will content myself with briefly stating the facts. The plaintiff is a man of property, but something of a recluse who, so far as I can learn, has but few friends in this city. He seeks to oust my client from possession of a house occupied by the defendant and his family for one year, during which period he has paid as many as three months' rent. Has he shown that the defendant was able to pay more? There is not one word of testimony on this point. Plaintiff has merely shown that the defendant is in default. Now the defendant, if your Honor please, is a poor mechanic and a good joiner. He is a prominent member of the Building Trades Council, and a most active member of several fraternal societies among them being the Philanthropic and Protective Order of Red Herrings, the Noble Knights of the Square Hole, the Ingenious Squires of the Double Cross, The Forest Rangers of the Universe and the Independent Order of Delphic Oracles. Obviously, your Honor, he is a man of some standing in this community, and it is not to be presumed of him that he doesn't pay his rent from evil motives. Nay your Honor, his friends whose name is legion have absolute confidence in him, and greatly would they distrust any one who would inflict injury upon him. Indeed they have authorized me to say that were he to lose this case an indignation meeting would be held and somebody would be hanged in effigy. So it must be clear to this court that the plaintiff has utterly failed to establish a cause of action. Indeed he has failed to show that he has any standing except in his own estimation. He is a man of wealth but with no social connections or any means of invoking the sovereignty of the people. I submit that there is a preponderance of circumstances in favor of my client, and I ask for judgment against the plaintiff for costs. I think he is lucky that I don't ask that he be committed to jail.—M. Ig—ius Su—an.

I move for a non-suit. It is apparent, if your Honor please, that the plaintiff has no cause of action. The defendant here, the most widely-read newspaper in the State of California, is being sued for $50,000 damages for having libeled the plaintiff. And what has he shown? He has offered in evidence the whole front page of the paper to show that by inadvertence he was represented to be a horse-thief and a murderer, the son of a bigamist, the father of a forger, the uncle of a pick-pocket and the brother of a swindler. But of course your Honor will take judicial cognizance of the fact that mistakes will occur in the best regulated newspaper offices And your Honor will take judicial cognizance of the fact that the Daily Howler is one of the most conservative and highly respected journals in this country. The esteem in which it is held was indicated at the last election when one of your confreres of the bench was recalled at the instigation of this defendant. That unfortunate man, it will be remembered, gave judgment against the Daily Howler in a suit for damages brought by an aged and decrepit widow who was represented as having poisoned her husband. As in this case the charge was made by inadvertence, but the lady was given a retraction of three lines, which, considering the value of space in the Daily Howler, was a most generous salve to her wounds. The Daily Howler is always just, as just as it is influential. It is a popular journal because it is devoted to the welfare of the people, and allowances ought to be made for the mistakes that occasionally creep into its columns. Indeed the people declared at the last recall election that allowances must be made, and the sentiment of the people I cite to your Honor in support of this motion.—Bar—ay H—ley

Counsel for plaintiff has had a great deal to say about the law of the case. He has told us what the common law is, what the fundamental principles of the law are and what the courts of all the States have affirmed the law to be. All of which I submit is an insult to this court. The law of this case is whatsoever your Honor pronounces it. Counsel appears to be unaware of the fact that he is living in a Progressive commonwealth where the law of the State is the will of the people. Here in California has been realized the true conception of the sovereignty of the masses. With us law is nothing unless close behind it stands a warm living public opinion. Thank Heavens we have come to recognize the fact that the people's safety is the law of God. We care naught for the forms of law. They have always been the graves of buried liberties. Law grinds the poor and rich men make the law. The greatest of all injustice is that which forces the letter of the law against the equity of the case. There was a time when it was impossible for us even to commit murder without laws and maxims, but thank God that time is past. We now recognize that the universal and absolute law is that natural justice which cannot be written down but which appeals to the hearts of all warm-blooded men. The courts of this State are not governed by the common law, nor are they guided by the hair-splitting of the old fogies of the bench in New England and elsewhere. Their decisions reflect the advanced thought of the times. Their wisdom is vindicated by the approval of public sentiment. The thing for your Honor to know in this case is not what Chief Justice Thingumbob of Pennsylvania said fifty years ago, but what the average citizen of our most enlightened State is likely to say tomorrow. And for these reasons, your Honor, I will not bore you with citations from dry and heavy tomes. I will do nothing more than report to your Honor that last night I heard this case discussed in Eddie Graney's saloon and that there the consensus of opinion was that the defendant was a ten-to-one shot.—F—is J. X—WILLIS POLK

By Edward F. O'Day

Life has its compensations after all. It is not all a dusty highway with no roadhouse in sight. If you keep pushing on through the brambly brake you are sure to reach the grassy glade. After the very worst of roads your sixty-horse power car is apt to strike a stretch of macadam. The most irresponsible of borrowers sometimes pays you back. But hold—We are not here to listen to a sermon of apothegmatic bromides. Our business today is with Willis Polk, so let us not be betrayed by our penchant for moralizing into forgetfulness of our first proposition which may be restated thus: Willis Polk, if he chose, could pen a very interesting sequel to Emerson's justly celebrated essay on Compensations.

For on this current Saturday night Willis Polk will be wreathed with the jonquils of glory, as one of our reception committeemen might put it. He will be crowned, metaphorically of course, with the oak leaves that symbolize victory in one of the prettiest architectural Marathons ever run. After having been roasted to a turn year after year he will be toasted in vintage wines. After having been boiled in oil, again metaphorically, the hinges of his self-esteem will be lubricated with the salve of laudation. After having been knocked he will be slapped on the back; after having been consigned to the pit of Tophet he will be raised on the wings of oratory propelled by the breath of postprandial hot-air to the brilliant heights of Paradise where he may look down on the roof of his tallest skyscraper. Not to keep you guessing, Willis Polk is to be a guest of honor at the Pacific-Union Club banquet.

Just picture that pretty scene. Visualize Willis Polk, his starched bosom swelling with pride and undigested compliments, his eye flashing with exultation and champagne, rising to address the assemblage of gout, chalkstones, corpulence and filthy lucre known as the Pacific-Union Club. Before him and about him in that beautiful hall of paneled English walnut Dives is spooning up his bisque Tortoni and Midas is draining his Cordon Rouge. He sees here a malefactor of great wealth who used to call him a "bum architect;" he glimpses there, through the fragrant haze of fat regalias, a captain of industry who prophesied that he "couldn't come back." And as the applause that greeted his rising dies away he flourishes his serviette in a gesture of modest deprecation and launches into an exposition of how it all happened.

You will admit that it is not every architect who is commissioned to build a million-dollar club for effete and blase millionaires. You will concede that not every architect so commissioned would go to the trouble of knocking a couple of piffling hundred thousands off the original cost. And you will not gainsay the observation that when the architect who does this is one who never went to school, who first learned how to build and afterwards found out why it was done thus and not otherwise, who was stigmatized as a dreamer without practical ideas and an idealist without business sagacity—that such an architect, filling the foreground of such a picture as that which I have endeavored to sketch, has every right in the world to feel as though he has not lived in vain. And that just about represents the sentiment that is permeating Willis Polk at the present writing.

Architects are not unlike other professional men. Jealously is not absolutely unknown among them. For the man who rises from the ranks they are apt to entertain a less kindly feeling than for the man who is accredited from a college. They bow their heads reverently if you come from the Beaux Arts and wag them derisively if you come from the carpenter's bench. Academic training is their badge of caste and Willis Polk never had any academic training worth boasting about. Yet he sympathizes with the peculiar ply of his architectural brethren to the extent of admitting that five years of collegiate instruction would have saved him ten of mighty hard sledding.

Polk came into the world in strict accordance with specifications in Kentucky in 1865. About his only equipment for the subsequent struggle was a class A reinforced determination, first of all to help his family and in the second place, to make a name for himself. His father had been an architect but at the outbreak of the Rebellion he rolled up his blueprints, tossed them on the shelf and donned a gray uniform. He came out of the struggle with inflammatory rheumatism and an empty exchequer and when Willis was seven years old the family moved to St. Louis. To help support the family he sold newspapers, ran errands, was a cash boy, did anything in fact that would bring in a little money. He says he was a good newsboy and sold a hundred papers every Sunday morning. At the age of eleven his father went to Hot Springs for the alleviation of his rheumatism and took Willis along. There father and son collaborated on a building and as you stroll down Central Avenue in Hot Springs you may still see the "Iron Block," the first fruit of young Polk's architectural exertion. Two years later, at the mature age of thirteen, Willis saw an advertisement for bids for a new school house at Hope, Arkansas. He took a chance and got the contract. He not only drew the plans but also worked as a carpenter and stonemason in the erection of that modest temple of learning. From that time on he was a sure-enough "architect and builder" and did a good deal of work in Arkansas and Texas. In 1885 he went to Boston where he had the good fortune to meet Henry Van Brunt, one of the country's great architects, and in Van Brunt's office he began to learn something of the principles of architecture. Through Van Brunt he made the acquaintance of Professor William R. Ware who occupied the chair of architecture at Columbia. So he drifted to New York and cultivated Professor Ware, sitting with him night after night to absorb architectural lore and occasionally attending his lectures. He used to occupy a little hall bedroom on a Box and Cox arrangement. One day his fellow-lodger came into the room and insisted that he get up so that he, the fellow-lodger, might go to bed. That was his introduction to Oliver Herford, wit and writer, and their subsequent intimacy developed in Polk a facility for saying sharp truths that has helped to make him many enemies—and many friends Stanford White and Augustus St. Gaudens were not famous in those days and young Polk used to pal with them. To the end of their lives this intimate association continued. In 1889 he came to San Francisco, just about the time that Architecture struck the town. Previous to that the "architecture" of our buildings, barring a few homes on Nob Hill and Pacific Heights, was of the jigsaw variety. We built first and then ordered our "architecture" from a planing mill. Conditions were changing when Willis Polk arrived here, but the change did not do him a great deal of good. He had plenty of time to cultivate his artistic sense, but few opportunities to practice his profession; so he was broke most of the time. When he did get a job a lot of the other architects stood around and explained how little they thought of him. Their explanations did not worry Polk and he gave as good as he received. With artists of all sorts he was popular and in '93 he helped organize the famous "Roseleaves," a coterie of Bohemian clubmen which included Dan O'Connell, Denis O'Sullivan, Ned Townsend, Charles Rollo Peters, Pete Bigelow, Joe Redding and other choice spirits. There was lots of gray matter in that crowd but no money, a fact which was attested by the celebrated suit of Comomdore Harrison versus the Roseleaves for the rent of the yacht Frolic, a suit in which most of the millionaires in town were made co-defendants with the poverty-stricken Bohemians. About the same time Polk became something of a newspaperman, contributing to the Sunday and weekly papers and distinguishing himself, through the accident of being on the train, by scooping the state on the first hold-up of Evans and Sontag.

The year '97 was a particularly hard year for Polk and he spent most of it in seclusion from bill collectors drawing a plan for a wonderful peristyle and arch approach to the Ferry Building from Market street. Polk has that drawing yet. He says a great artist once declared that it was the biggest pen and ink drawing in the

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over

By Robert McTavish

Where is California?

One of the Congressmen who spoke for New Orleans during the recent exposition contest was the Hon. J. Thomas Heflin of Alabama. Heflin must have known that the fight was lost, for he engaged in airy persiflage, as may be judged by reading this extract from the Congressional Record:

Mr. Speaker, it is still a mooted question as to where California is. John S. McGroarty, a Californian, writing in the Los Angeles Times, says: "The American continent is the back yard of California." Mr. Speaker, that is the limit. Mr. McGroarty quotes Colonel Roosevelt, who once said: "California is not in the West; it is west of the West." (Laughter.) And still the question is, Where is California? Mr. McGroarty quotes from another author concerning California, who says:

It lies not in the East or West,
But like a scroll unfurled,
It lies where God hath hung it,
Down the middle of the world.

(Applause and laughter.)

Now, who wants to take a chance, Mr. Speaker, at an exposition held on a thing hanging in the middle of the world? (Laughter.) But we are told that—

Oft the flowers of perfect bliss
Are plucked on danger's precipice.

(Applause and laughter.)

Mr. Speaker, who wants to go to the middle of the world to attend an exposition, and who is able to make the expensive trip? Or who has the time for such a long, long journey?

Another in this same paper tells us that California lies midway between the Orient and the Occident. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is as far as Red Egypt and lies somewhere twixt the eremite star of the Orient desert's lone dawn and the porch of the chambers of rest. (Applause and laughter.)

The Mormons Busy in Liverpool

Mormon missionaries have been busy again in England, and indignation is rising against the ravages that have been and are being made in the young womanhood of Liverpool. The protestors number among them leading citizens, social workers, clergy, and the bishop of Liverpool himself. They are up in arms at last, and they demand nothing short of legislation, and stringent legislation, to help them combat the insidious work which in the name of religion is being done in their midst. Sermons have been preached against Mormonism, pamphlets have been printed, but all to no effect. For Liverpool girls stll continue to find mysterious aid for passages to Utah. Some "mysterious friend" advances the money. Is this friend a Mormon agency? The Mormons repudiate the suggestion. "We have no hand in it," they say with heat. Yet the girls still continue to go, and Utah continues to receive them into its bosom.

The Compliments of the Editor

Up in the Sacramento Valley two editors have been indulging in the amenities of journalism. The dispute is of no consequence; it is the language of their disputation which commands attention. This is the way the editor of the Oroville Mercury writes about the editor of the Marysville Democrat:

After garbling the English language in his inimitable manner, the personal chaser for the Marysville Democrat endeavors to throw some mud and insinuations at a story published in the Mercury sometime ago relative to six inches of water being upon the tracks of the Southern Pacific between Honcut and Palermo. With his well known "nose for news" he declares that the story was exaggerated and that the road bed was merely "soft." The editor of the Mercury admits that he is a newcomer and that he is not acquainted with the surrounding country as well as he might be but if it takes him as long to get next to the conditions as it seems to have taken the editor of the Yuba county sheet, judging from the appearances of the paper, he is willing to take a back seat and stay there. This is a little farther than some people are willing to go. The story printed was given to the editor of the Mercury by a newspaperman who knows more about the country, including Marysville, than this scribe will ever get through his rather thick cranium if he hangs on to a pencil until he cashes in his checks.

Twenty-five Most Beautiful Words

Some organization in New York offered a prize for the twenty-five most beautiful words in the English language and a lawyer won it by submitting the following:

Melody, splendor, adoration, eloquence, virtue, innocence, modesty, faith, joy, honor, radiance, nobility, sympathy, heaven, love, divine, hope, harmony, happiness, purity and liberty.

This list is short four words, but what's the odds? There are enough here and to spare. They may not please all tastes, but they probably accomplish the purpose which the lawyer had in mind when he gathered them together. They prove that the lawyer has a Beautiful Soul.

The Hula as a Kirmess Dance

Down in Honolulu they are having a tempest in a teapot because it is proposed to give the hula as one of the dances in a Kirmess for the benefit of charity. Some of the preachers are up in arms. One of them says the word hula cannot be uttered in polite society and characterizes the dance as "the embodiment of the grossest and most bestial elements of the heathenism that once covered these beautiful islands," which is "going some." The Kirmess committee reply that even the waltz may be made lascivious and that the hula need be no more indecent than a two-step. Another apologist finds the hula woven of "threads of a thousand hues and of many fabrics, representing the imaginations of the poet, the speculations of the philosopher, the aspirations of many a thirsty soul." And so the controversy goes on. To an outsider it looks as though the hula is a dance where every little movement has a meaning all its own and that there is a marvelous diversity of opinion as to its interpretation.

One of the "Lost Dauphins"

It often seems to outsiders that the French treat serious matters lightly and light matters seriously, so few will be surprised to learn that the French Senate is to debate the claims of Naundorff to the throne. As there is no throne in France the debate can have no practical outcome, but that is no reason for not having the debate. A ponderous report has been made and will be very gravely considered. Naundorff claims to be descended directly from that Dauphin who is popularly believed to have died in the Temple while Marie Antoinette and Louis XVI were incarcerated there. He is not unique in his claim. There are seventeen other pretenders to the same distinction, but he is alone in securing the dubious official recognition implied in a senatorial debate. The best Naundorff can hope is that he will be allowed to use the name Bourbon. That will be something, for he will then be the center of a group of royalists who have as much hope of overturning the republic as the "legitimists" in England have of seating a Stuart on the throne of George V.

A Closed-Shop Coast

According to the Spectator of Portland Samuel Gompers is raising a $500,000 fund to be expended in bringing about the closed shop along the Pacific Coast "from San Diego to the British Columbia line." "None of us," says the Portland weekly, "will be allowed to see, taste, smell, touch, or hear unless the organs that perform these interesting and ofttimes useful functions are union-made, and bear the brand of Samuel Gompers." The "war for the re-enslavement of the manumitted wage-earner and wage-payer" is to begin in Los Angeles. The Spectator continues:

When Los Angeles has been thoroughly Gompersized, the process will be repeated here, for this is the first large open-shop town north of the Southern California metropolis. And what are we going to do about it? Permit ourselves to be unionized, Gompers-branded, and put in closed-shop cold-storage, where San Francisco is? In four years, the closed-shop policy, which Gompers has mapped out for us, has left San Francisco with 30 per cent of her manufactures. Do you business men of Portland desire to see this city suffer from the blight that has almost destroyed San Francisco? If you do, remain quiescent at the switch, while Gompers ropes, throws, and brands you, and turns your fair-house establishments into closed shops.

Sacramento's Growing Pains

Sacramento is growing so rapidly that it has growing pains. There is an actual lack of accommodations for the people who go to the capital. Josef Hofmann, the celebrated pianist, could not get a room in any of the hotels and had to put up at a private residence. Many of the members of the Western Fruit Jobbers' Association which held its convention in Sacramento recently experienced the same inconvenience. Although the city has built two big hotels within the past two years more are needed and there is talk of beginning work on a hostelry to contain five or six hundred rooms. Sacramento has reached a point where it is indifferent to the sitting of the Legislature. It regards "statesmen" with the same insouciance with which congressmen are treated in Washington. The city has struck its stride and is forging right ahead. Fortunes are being made in real estate.

The most popular native table wine in the United States is the Italian-Swiss Colony's TIPO (red or white). There is a reason—it is the best.

A Run of Luck

Amelia Rosselli (From the Italian)

Carlotta Moretti, having finished her gossip about things in general with her friend, Anna De Mari, arose, exclaiming: "It must be getting late." But the other forced her gently to reseat herself.

"Stay a little longer, do. Don't you see how it is raining? Unless you take a carriage you will be drenched, and that would be a pity; your dress is delicious."

A complacent smile played upon the lips of the visitor.

"It is true," she said, looking toward the window; "it is pouring."

The little drawing-room was pervaded with a vague gloom. In one corner the water for the tea bubbled softly. A gray mist veiled the window, impeding the view of the double row of trees which bordered the street, reaching up with their tallest branches nearly to the tops of the houses.

The two friends were silent, having nothing left to talk about.

Carlotta Moretti reached across indifferently to a little table loaded with knicknacks which stood near the sofa and touched a statuette of old ivory, a small Buddha, fat and grotesque, which she took up to examine more carefully.

"Beautiful!" she said finally, with the air of a connoisseur acquired by frequenting the numerous auction sales which are among the social attractions of winter Rome. "Beautiful! Who gave it to you?"

"My husband."

"I suppose so; he never misses a sale and he offers fabulous sums. The other day he bid a thousand lire for a Capodimonte which was hardly worth three hundred, but it was knocked down to Selmi at a thousand and thirty. They hate each other, Selmi and your husband. There must be some old story about a woman."

She put the statuette carefully down on the table; then continued with a light laugh:

"Oh, well! These auction sales lend themselves admirably to the betrayal of certain small secrets. It was for example at the famous San Giorgi sale last winter that I discovered the—er—more than friendship between Elena and Lieutenant Raimondi. Indeed, it sufficed that she should merely mention her desire to make an offer, for him to at once desist from bidding whenever by chance their hearts were set on the same object. And this year was I not the first to suspect the rupture? Elena was infatuated one day with a tiny Louis Quinze fan—oh, a perfect darling! As Raimondi suspected it, he amused himself by bidding it up for spite; in the end she had to cede it to him. That is a satisfaction one can gratify only when one has an unlimited bank account—like your husband for instance. Is it true what they say, that for sometime now he has been having a wonderful run of luck at cards?"

"I don't know," Anna replied abstractedly.

Her thought centered on the Capodimonte statuette of which Selmi had deprived her husband.

Carlotta continued: "If I were you, I should advise him to lose. Seriously, you know," she added with a singular expression.

To Anna these words came as if from a distance. Then she asked, her attention aroused:

"Whom would you advise to lose?"

"Your husband."

"Ah, and why?"

"Because in this world there are people both wicked and malicious. Does that surprise you?"

Whereupon, with a side glance toward the window, she stood up, adding:

"It is not raining now. I shall profit by the interval. Good-bye, Anna. Shall we meet this evening at the Mainos'?"

"I don't know. Perhaps."

"Give my regards to Carlo."

"Thanks."

After Carlotta Moretti's departure other callers dropped into Anna's little parlor and, while she smiled at all of them and entertained them courteously, she felt in her brain, like strokes of a hammer, the incessant repetition of the phrase: "I should advise him to lose, because there are in this world people both wicked and malicious."

Was it possible, could it be that anyone suspected Carlo, her Carlo, to be capable of—she did not dare to formulate the whole of the atrocious thought.

But when Colonel Ludovici entered, the only man among so many women, and inquired politely, "How is Carlo?" Anna blushed in spite of herself, and her voice trembled involuntarily in replying, "He will be here very soon."

The colonel, however, after a few minutes bowed and went away. One by one the ladies departed. Anna remained alone.

Now the room was almost dark. Only the flame in the fireplace acquired in the gathering dusk an intensity of color like a blood-stain.

Anna approached the window. It had stopped raining; the passers by were rare and proceeded by zigzagging along, jumping over one puddle after another. She sighed. What a weight oppressed her heart! She could not decide how to act when Carlo returned.

Should she say to him, "Your persistent luck at cards is causing comment; do try to lose," he would only laugh heartily and, kissing her, exclaim, "Let them talk; provided you continue to love me and give the lie to the proverb!" Then she also would laugh, and in their mutual mirth the weight would vanish from her heart.

She rang for the servant to light the lamps and draw the curtains; the room seemed suddenly to have become cold and damp. Shivering, she drew a chair close to the glowing fire, picked up a book and turned over a few leaves desultorily.

But soon she let it fall on her lap, struck with a new idea.

Suppose he did not smile. Suppose he wanted to know the name of the one who had suggested the base suspicion! "Tell me his name!" And she seemed to see Carlo pacing up and down the room demanding this name that he might revile it. "His name!"

"But—no one in particular—everyone," she imagined herself replying.

"Hah! Everyone is no one. One might as well look for a needle in a haystack! One would be obliged to fight the whole world!"

"To fight!"

It was as if a dagger transfixed her heart. She grew pale at the thought.

Of course he would want to confront the unknown accuser. He would be obliged to find him out. No man who respected himself would tolerate for a moment the shadow of such a suspicion. She herself would secretly despise him should he endure it ignominously. No, she must be silent at whatever price. She took up her book again and tried to read.

The door opened and Carlo came in.

"Brrrr-r! How cold it is outside!"

He looked around the room.

"Alone? Well, who would come in such weather!"

"Oh, yes, lots of people came." And Anna mentioned their names—except that of Carlotta.

"Ah, Ludovici also? I thought he was dead, it is so long since we have seen him."

She felt her throat contract with sudden pain.

"Where have you been?"

"At the club."

"Did you play?"

"Oh, only a little; I went there late."

"You—you lost?" she questioned half affirmatively, leaning toward him.

"No, I won. Five hundred francs."

She fell back in her chair as if he had struck her on the breast.

At that moment she felt an absolute repugnance for him. She would have liked to accuse him of obstinacy in winning—to show him that it was a want of tact; a sin against the world; against her; to convince him of the necessity of losing; of losing much; of losing everything.

But instead she said through clenched teeth:

"You always win. It seems impossible."

"It is my lucky moment. Yes."

Then the butler entered to announce dinner.

She could not eat a mouthful.

Soon, without intending, almost without realizing it, Anna began to observe her husband attentively. If he seemed to be less cheerful than usual, she was uncertain whether to sympathize with him or to rejoice in the hope that he had lost.

"What is the matter, Carlo?" she would ask.

"With me? Nothing."

"Really?"

"Really."

Did he not avoid looking at her when he replied?

One evening while they were still at dinner, a friend called to see him. Anna was describing to Carlo a piece of jewelry which she had seen in Caglo's window on the Corso, and her eyes sparkled with the light of desire almost like a reflection of that which flashed from the many facets of the precious stones.

The friend, turning to Carlo, remarked: "If you were a devoted husband, you would arrange to have that very ornament at your wife's place tomorrow morning at breakfast."

"Were I rich enough to permit myself that luxury I certainly should do so," Carlo replied lightly.

"One evening at the club and the jewel were easily bought!" exclaimed his friend laughingly.

"But he might lose," Anna observed.

"Lose? He? Never!"

There was a trace of irony in his manner of pronouncing the words, or at least it appeared so to Anna. She trembled slightly and glanced at Carlo, who was calmly peeling an orange. Anna felt like getting up and shaking him and crying out: "Don't you feel it, the insult? The cruel,

Is the Octopus Dead?

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Have you read the railroad bill? If not, look it up, read, analyze and digest, and then tell us whether you think the Octopus is dead, or, on the contrary, very much alive and close to the powers that be. It seems to me that the Octopus ought to be grateful to this Administration, for if Jim Hill had any intention of coming into California he will probably change his mind when he learns of what has been done at Sacramento. No wonder the S. P. is about to double-track its system and extend its feeders. If "the interests" have Works who has Johnson?

Too Many Holidays?

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I note that our Mayor has issued a proclamation asking the people of San Francisco to put on their holiday togs next Saturday and give themselves up to rejoicing on account of our victory in the exposition contest. I flatter myself that I am a loyal San Franciscan and that I appreciate the good work which has been done for us by the committee which went to Washington. But don't you think that we are doing just a little too much celebrating? Don't you think we are having too many holidays? It would be all right if all of us could participate in these holidays but we can't. Lincoln Day was a legal holiday but the store in which I am employed remained open all day and I did my "celebrating" behind the counter. There are a lot of overworked girls in our store, but a lot of these holidays mean absolutely nothing to them. They have to work while more fortunate men and women are "banishing dull care" in the cafes and other places. Even when they get a holiday they don't always enjoy it. I know dozens who were so tired that they spent Christmas and New Year's in bed. It strikes me that San Francisco is becoming an all-the-year-round carnival city. We never seem happy unless we are tooting horns and throwing confetti and eating and drinking too much in celebration of something or other. Isn't it time to call a halt? I admit that I am prejudiced. It makes me dissatisfied to see others making merry while I am making sales. I don't get any extra pay for working on holidays either. Don't you agree with me that it is time to call a halt on this incessant merrymaking? Do you think it's good for business?

Very sincerely yours,

February 20. —A Counter Jumper.

An Argument for the Recall

Editor of Town Talk: I have read with interest and some degree of understanding your editorials upon the proposed law to recall the judges. Your stand upon this question is to my mind indefensible. In theory there is some basis for your conclusions, in actual practice none.

Let us deal with the situation here in San Francisco. Your arguments would be conclusive if every judge here were a Seawell, a Graham or a Murasky, but how answer this brute question: What of the Dunnes and Lawlors?

Take the case of Lawlor. Do you remember the Buckley case? Union Labor has not forgotten it. William Buckley was convicted of the murder of George Rice, a non-union machinist. The case was tried before Lawlor. Lord Jeffreys at the Bloody Assizes was Lawlor's model in presiding at Buckley's trial. On the unsupported testimony of a little twelve-year-old school girl Buckley was condemned to the gallows. But you will say, Did not the jury convict? How foolish! Did not the juries of his infamous prototype Jeffreys convict? Just remember the Buckley jurors were Lawlor's professionals. Good men of whom it was said, they could not distinguished between a reasonable doubt and two dollars per day. "My blood-hounds," as Lawlor is said to have affectionately described them to a crony.

Buckley was convicted, Lawlor knew he was innocent, but despite that brought about his conviction, and oh the smug satisfaction with which he imposed sentence of death. It was many years ago but even now my blood chills as I call to mind that scene.

Tom Moran, a happy smiling innocent lad, was next led to the Lawlor Bloody Assizes. But even the "blood-hounds" could not muster hardihood to heed the master's voice. Life imprisonment was Moran's fate. He is in San Quentin to this day. He is innocent. Lawlor knew it. Tom Ryan, an honest policeman, who handled the case for the department will tell you so and prove it.

Recall the judges? Well rather! Union Labor can now speak to Lawlor in a language he will understand.

Respectfully,

—Charles W. Dawson,
A Union Machinist.

The Fair Site

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: How much of unselfishness there is among people generally when private interest seems not identical with the public interest is being illustrated by the votes for exposition sites which are rolling up in the columns of the Call. In this morning's paper Golden Gate Park has 4,165 votes; Bay View, 900; Harbor View, 679; Lake Merced, 387; Tanforan, 312; the Water Front, 273. Here we find that the great bulk of the voters are influenced by personal considerations. The Park receives the highest number of votes because it is a great center of population, of property that presumably will receive direct benefit. To owners of downtown property it doesn't make much difference where the Fair is held. But for the city as a whole there can be no question that the water front is pre-eminently the best site. Yet the water front has received but 273 votes. That site should be selected, of course, from which the largest and most lasting benefit may be derived, and that site indubitably is the water front. The Park is not a suitable site because almost all the money that would be spent for buildings in the Park would go to waste. The water front is the best site because nearly all the money that would be spent there would go into permanent improvements. Furthermore by spending the money on the water front what is now the ugliest section of the city would be transformed into the most beautiful. Both by reason of esthetic and utilitarian considerations the water front site should be selected, and the result would be that San Francisco would have a harbor unparalleled for beauty in all the world. We shall have great reason to lament the folly of the men who have the power of selecting a site if they prove indifferent to the potentialities of the water front. And I very much fear that they will yield to the persuasions of private interests.

The Spectator

Our Tireless Patriots

In the opinion of the patriots who are now making fantastic history for us it is high time for the Supreme Court to be made subservient to the current dispensation. There are some stubborn men in that tribunal. They seem absolutely callous to the ordinary processes of intimidation. The Hon. Rudolph Spreckels, patriot paramount of the sanhedrin, now emulating the shrinking violet and deeply interested in a big will contest which the Supreme Court must decide, is not able to say at this time that the decision will be in his favor or what may happen to a writ of habeas corpus now pending. Fremont Older, character assassin for the cabal, knows that the majority of the court is not prepossessed in his favor. Nay, he is mindful of the fact that it was this court which but a few months ago ordered him back to Fresno to be tried for criminal libel on the accusation of Will Tevis, and ever since the court accorded justice to the man whom he had injured he has been raging like a catamount. Of course Governor Johnson, who was an attorney for Older in that criminal case, is in sympathy with his client, and besides it is perhaps but human nature that he should be eager to have the appointment of a few good dogs to the tribunal that serves as a barrier to his otherwise despotic power. How like the experience of France after the French Revolution is that which we are now having! For many years after the French Revolution nothing happened in France that was not a direct consequence of that extraordinary event. Friendships, hatreds, political combinations, social upheavals,—all derived their inspiration from that one capital fact which had thoroughly changed the whole condition of life and which the people expiated by protracted suffering. The people of this State are now expiating the excesses of the graft prosecution. All the feverish agitations by which we are being tormented, the reprisals of the ex-attorney for the vindictive cabal now in the gubernatorial chair, the besmirching of the Supreme Court and the campaign of slander against the judiciary by which public confidence in the administration of justice is being undermined, are fresh manifestations of the revengeful spirit that was thwarted in consequence of its own enormities when San Francisco was being purified by the Pharisees.

Their Masterly Project

The patriots would achieve a great triumph of strategy were they to succeed in railroading one or two members of the Supreme Court into private life and enable Hiram Johnson to fill the vacancies. When the scheme was broached last week it was not taken seriously, yet the plans for this masterly consummation were pretty well cut and dried. At first there was no widespread alarm in the legal profession, for it was not supposed that the patriots would have the nerve to handle the bench with as little compunction as they have shown in hogging the ordinary patronage of pot-house politics. Not many people are conscious of the desperate character of the lawless intriguers of the old graft cabal, who in the days when they were ruling the city with an iron hand perpetrated one enormity after another with such abandon that there seemed to be no limit to their boldness. Now that they are in the saddle again they are once more riding to a fall in the same reckless fashion with which they broke open private safes, tampered with juries and conspired to incite the mob to bloodshed. The terror with which they were filled when Biggy was swallowed up in the waters of the bay at a psychological moment has subsided, and with Hiram on the job and many of the legislators at his beck and call they have thrown off all restraint and are eager for new conquests. Realizing the impossibility of impeaching the Supreme Court without warrant they contemplated getting rid of one or two members by hocus-pocus; and to give plausibility to their enterprise Fremont Older has been prepared to open his floodgates and let loose a tide of slander that would fill the State with its mephitic odors. But when last heard from Older was complaining that some of the legislators were too timid for the job.

NEW BOXES OF NEW CHOCOLATES

Why They Are Timid

The truth is of course that the legislators regard the frame-up as too flimsy and feel that their work if performed according to program would be a little too coarse. At first blush the pretext which Older contrived for them seemed to be sufficient to justify summary action, but it was soon learned that the distinguished journalist had only been diffusing malicious calumny with his usual effronterey. There was of course not an atom of truth in the story that suspicious irregularities attended the granting of a rehearing to Abe Ruef. The venerable Chief Justice had not been guilty of forgery, nor had he connived at anything that had the appearance of skulduggery. The petition for a rehearing was granted in the same way that similar petitions have been granted by the same court during a period of sixty years. Of the truth of this there is now no dispute. If for a time color was given to the preposterous yarn of the graft cabal's character assassin it was because that serviceable functionary Attorney-General Webb, who seems extremely responsive to Older's emotions, precipitously burrowed with his eager nose where his mentor, the illustrious muckraker, had been trying to evoke a smell. And in default of an odor Mr. Webb contented himself with a technicality. Spite of the current prejudice of reformers against technicalities Mr. Webb challenged the order granting the rehearing on the ground that the justices had not acted concurrently, which is something they have never done in similar matters. And so while there may really be something in this technicality the only question involved is not whether Ruef is really entitled to a rehearing, not whether a man who is still a citizen as well as a rogue has been vouchsafed the rights that he is guaranteed by the Constitution, but whether somebody's name was affixed to a paper within a given time. Which shows that a technicality is really not an abomination provided it may be employed against the other fellow. And so it appears there is really some excuse for the timidity of those gentlemen at Sacramento who have grown somewhat wise during the course of developments.

Showing the heroine of three matrimonial ventures on her yacht "Ramona" with her daughter Gladys, now Mrs. Powers Gouraud. Harry Gillig who was then Amy Crocker's husband is seen in the background.

A Friend of the Administration

There is one thing to be said about the members of this reform Legislature and it is this,—that they are progressive beyond the provisions of the Constitution. If they are disposed to have the organic law amended it is only to give the people not themselves more power. Whatever power they wish they take. For illustration consider the matter of the contest over the seat occupied by Senator D. P. Regan of this city. The unseating of Regan is demanded on the ground that he has not resided a year in the district which he represents. The investigating committee has received evidence that such is the case. Under the Constitution there is nothing to be done but to seat Thomas M. Searey, who was Regan's opponent at the last election. But the Senators, I learn from the Call's correspondent, will not give Searey the seat occupied by Regan. Why not? Well for the very good reason, as the Call's correspondent gravely asserts, that Regan " is a friend of the Administration." What's the Constitution between friends!

Amy Crocker Gouraud and a Secretary

From New York comes word that Harold Sussman has quit his job. Who is Harold Sussman? He was "literary" secretary to Mrs. Amy Crocker Gouraud, but he has tired of the job. Henceforth Mrs. Gouraud must write her own stories or hire another "literary" secretary to aid with the sizzling and tabasco tales that appear over her signature. Mr. Sussman has purchased a railway ticket to Los Angeles and says he will betake himself to the land of the setting sun with such dispatch as he can accomplish. Broadway has regarded Mr. Sussman with deep interest ever since his literary partnership with Mrs. Amy Crocker-Ashe-Gillig-Gouraud was first announced shortly after her widowhood last year. Reports of a matrimonial engagement between the couple were afloat shortly after Mr. Sussman became a member of the Gouraud literary menage, but these were and still are denied by the writer. "Nothing so unjust to Mrs. Gouraud nor so absurd could possibly be believed," said Mr. Sussman. "Mrs. Gouraud was devoted to the memory of her late husband when I became associated with her literary affairs, and so far as I am aware is still unconsoled." On his word of honor as a perfectly good story writer, Mr. Sussman assures Broadway that so far from being Mrs. Gouraud's guest on his trip to France last year, he paid his own traveling expenses, and has the tickets to prove it. He furthermore declares the sincerest admiration for his former literary partner, but shudders at the memory of some of the persons who compose her "salon." Complete inability to accept certain of them as social equals is as definite a reason as Mr. Sussman gives for severing his position of collaborator with Mrs. Gouraud.

How Powers Got the Boat

Jimmy Powers, star of the "Havana" company, tarried so long at the St. Francis Hotel Saturday night that he was in danger of missing the boat which took him to the Oakland mole where his special for Portland was waiting. When Powers found out how late it was he voiced his fears and a newspaperman who heard him said, "Get De Palmer to take you to the ferry." De Palmer is one of the racing automobilists who is here for the Portola road races across the bay. When he heard of the comedian's predicament he led the way to his racing car which was standing in Powell street. The newspaperman went along and he says he didn't draw breath between the hotel and the ferry building which may be a trifle exaggerated. De Palmer's car, however, has a speed of ninety miles an hour and there is no doubt that it traveled rapidly. "It seemed to me that we were no sooner seated in the car than we stopped at the ferry," said the reporter. "Why we went so fast that the wind reached into the

But an editor who was hurrying to catch it was so impressed with the speed of the car that his nose for news told him something was wrong and he went to the telephone to notify the office that there was an automobile "story" at the foot of Market street. He missed his boat and the late watch phoned vainly for the "story."

Self-Revelation of Fanny Ward

Fanny Ward of the Orpheum Circuit talked from the dramatic page to the readers of the Chronicle last Sunday. Let us listen to her in snatches: "There were some interesting things about my country estate. It was a place of 3,000 acres called Chalfont St. Giles. . . . I have a town house in Barclay (meaning Berkeley) square too. I suppose you'd call that the Pacific avenue of London. Lord Roseberry and all the titles are located there. With one exception I am the only actress who ever lived there, and she's got a title now. . . . I've had everything that money could buy for a woman. . . . I don't want to appear like a snob, because I'm not. . . . . Everything is so handsome and so solid here—so new and fresh, especially one of your critics. . . . It's lucky for me that I didn't wear my sable coat. That was made for the Empress of Russia, and cost my husband $15,000. . . . I married for a good time, and lived to regret it. . . . Of course I was fond of my husband, but he said he would make me love him—and didn't. . . . I suppose if I'd been a failure in the theater I'd have gone back to the social game. . . . My motto is to have a good time, no matter what happens. . . . About the only thing I miss is going to Monte Carlo every season. . . . Joe was down there with a stack of money in front of him almost as high as his head. Well, I wonder if I hustled down there after him? He declared he was playing for a friend. 'Well,' I said, 'she's here! Come through! Divvy!' . . . My first hunt breakfast. That was a scream. I had eighteen servants down there. . . . That was my cue to enter society, mind you." And so on ad nauseam. What kind of "society," gentle reader? The only kind of "society" to which South African multi-millionaires like Joe Lewis (Fanny's deceased hubby) and Barny Barnato are ever admitted in London. The kind of "society" which jingles its guineas and flashes its diamonds in Park Lane.

Disconsolate Jimmy Britt

I have just received a private tip from dear ole Lunnon that Jimmy Britt, fawnciest of the fawncy, is wasting away with grief and may never be knocked out again. I am told that when Jimmy ventures abroad he leaves a trail of tears from Hyde Park Corner to Rotten Row and from Piccadilly to Oxford Circus. They say that his gusty sighs can be heard from the Marble Arch to Charing Cross and that the Beefeaters in the Tower can see his bosom heaving in faraway Green Park. Word comes that the Serpentine is swollen with his weeping and that Thames has turned salty from his lachrymal downpour. The Trocadero has no delights for him; nor Romano's nor Frasscatti's can tease his appetite with tempting viands. And well may Jimmy mourn, for Neva Aymar jilted him. She has jilted him for a bloomin' jockey at that! Last season Neva Aymar was the most popular American player in the London music halls. She was considered by the Johnnies the dearest dear of Joe Hart's "Rain Dears." Among those who courted her smile was the Hon. Lieutenant Norman Dunbarton, own son to an earl no less. But Jimmy Britt, plumber among prizefighters and prizefighter among plumbers, was the lad to win her heart. They became engaged and Jimmy's cup of happiness was pretty nearly full. But there came the traditional slip. Winnie O'Connor appeared on the scene and began winning races at Epsom Downs, races on which Neva Aymar won a pot of money. After Winnie had ridden home a long shot which he had induced Neva to back heavily, she admitted to Britt that her heart was wavering. Just about that time Jimmy signed to fight Johnny Summers, the English lightweight. That was a strategic blunder. The training took him away from Neva and gave Winnie O'Connor a clear field. When Jimmy won—for he did win—he went to Neva to be congratulated and learned that she was engaged to Winnie. She told him the marriage would take place as soon as Winnie could secure a divorce. Winnie secured the divorce and the marriage took place in a little town near Paris where Winnie was riding. And whenever Jimmy thinks of the perfidy of "the Rain Dear" he sobs beneath his breath, "It is not raining rain to me, it's raining orange blossoms," whereupon he weeps some more.

"Happy" Dougherty Gone

Many have missed the smiling face of "Happy" Dougherty from the state capitol during the past two weeks. "Happy," it will be recalled, was formerly king of the newsboys of this city but was raised to the dignity of a state office by Frank C. Jordan and made messenger to the Secretary of State. For a brief time he was one of the proudest of the patriots serving California in Sacramento but his career was cut short by a combination of unfortunate circumstances. In the first place "Happy" sauntered into the capitol one morning and found the Governor with a friend admiring the noble rotunda of the building. Whether he had one too many or one too few, he certainly lost all sense of the difference in rank between the Governor and himself. Stepping up quickly behind Johnson, he slapped that dignitary familiarly on the back with the greeting: "Well, Hi, what do you think of the old house this morning?" The Governor whirled upon him, but "Happy" was on his way with the morning mail sack toward the office of the Secretary of State. "Who is that vulgar person?" asked Johnson of the friend beside him. "Oh, that's one of Frank Jordan's deputies," was the reply, so a few minutes later knock No. 1 had been registered against "Happy." Jordan summoned him and gave him a lecture but a few days later "Happy," on his way to the capitol with the morning mail, dropped in at the bar of the Hotel Land. There he met some friends and a pleasant hour was passed. After several rounds of drinks, the party decided to move on to another bar. By this time the sack of mail had begun to bother "Happy," so he tossed it to the bartender at the Land. "Just stow that down behind the bar somewhere until I come for it," he said, and the bartender accommodated him. "Happy" and his friends moved blithely on. The work of the Secretary of State was held up. Jordan sent messengers scurrying all over the city but could not find his deputy. Early in the afternoon, however, the Hotel Land bartender was about to go off duty when he thought of the mail bag. Afraid to leave it in the saloon, he returned it to the postoffice where it lay for several hours until late in the afternoon the postmaster telephoned Jordan and asked him to send after it. When "Happy" put in an appearance at the capitol the next morning he was told that he had trans-

Jimmy on the Job

Though our incomparable and foremostest public spirited citizen, the Hon. J. Duval Phelan has not been peacocking it in the limelight of our village of late, let it not be supposed that he has abandoned the toilsome trade of pursuing the ignis fatuus of popularity; let no one fear that he has fallen among the husks or into the formless ruin of oblivion. Our young millionaire is still a wooer of fame and there is no likelihood of his renouncing the virtues that deserve it. For the present there is no Macedonian cry for Jimmy from these parts, his gifts are no longer in demand hereabouts, but he is not neglecting the public interests. His tongue is temporarily sheathed, but there is no rust on his pen. That instrument is giving utterance to his profoundest thoughts on a vital public question, and the output seeks not a market in vain despite the closed door in the home of his earliest triumphs. Jimmy has broken out in the Sacramento Bee with a signed essay, illustrated with the writer's frank, open and bewhiskered countenance. The article is entitled "Should not the Legislature Act on the Japanese Question." Like a voice from the grave—for all the world like Denis Kearny's—is the voice of Phelan, proclaiming the urgency of legislation to prevent the "Japanization of California." Jimmy is making a noise like an alarmist, like one who would persuade Andy Gallagher and his confreres that he loves the poor workingman with a consuming passion and regrets very much that he policed the trucks in the teamsters' strike.

The Phelan Ego

"With our eyes open shall we submit to it?" Jimmy demands; "or shall craven fear or mistaken diplomacy seal our lips—I was going to say until the enemy is at the gates. The enemy is now within our gates, and therefore we should be alert to exercise that vigilance which is the price of liberty and without which no republican form of government can long exist." The essay abounds in noble sentiments in the platitudinous strain of the foregoing, and at the same time it is distinctly Phelanesque, the ego bristling all over it. By way of introduction Jimmy relates that when he was in Washington two years ago the State Department called him into consultation on the Japanese question. "I told the President," says Jimmy: "I based this on the ground"; "I was able to quote," etc., etc. A great man is Jimmy, shamefully unappreciated by the purblind citizens of this incorrigible community. By the way weren't Eugene Schmitz and P. H. McCarthy also called into consultation by the State Department?

Charles Wheeler Protests

No member of the bar is making a more active campaign against the anarchic proposal to apply the recall to the judiciary than Charles S. Wheeler. This is not astonishing, but it is worthy of mention because of Mr. Wheeler's affiliations and recent past performances. It has seemed that owing to his affiliations Mr. Wheeler was induced to give countenance at times to men and movements against which trained and cultivated sensibility might have been expected to revolt, but now he looms up as a man of absolute independence of character, true to his better instincts and eager to defeat the revengeful designs of his implacable friends. Mr. Wheeler's protest against the recall will command the respectful attention of laymen who have sense enough to appreciate the fact that a lawyer of his distinction ought to be heeded when he gives advice with reference to our system of justice.

A Rash Promise

Great was the disappointment of about one hundred young lawyers at the vetoing of the bill that provided for an increase in the number of our judges of the Superior Court. Great also was the disappointment of Judge Lawlor who is to be a candidate for re-election this fall and who has come to realize since his experience of the campaign last year that his chances as an incumbent would be greatly improved were four new men to be entered in the race. It was largely in the interest of Judge Lawlor that the bill was passed in spite of the fact that we have all the judges we need. And in his interest the bill would have been signed by the Governor had it not been for the vigorous protests of organized labor which has reasons of its own for not wanting any more judges. We are told that the Governor made the matter the subject of thorough inquiry, but this as I can authoritatively inform my readers is all buncombe. A lawyer who has practiced at the local bar for years required no light on the subject. The fact is that Governor Johnson intended at first to sign the bill. He so informed Senator Burnett who introduced the bill and who made no secret of the Governor's promise which organized labor made it expedient to break. Organized labor is the one special interest to separate all special interests from the affairs of government.

The Cunning of the Serpent

At one of the fancy dress balls given to see the old year out, a lovely lady who had left a good deal to nature in her choice of a ducky little frock, caused a certain amount of conjecture.

"Now, I know what you are meant to be," said one of the boys, finally, after taking in the details through his glazed eye—"You're New Year's 'Eve'!"

"The Lid On" at the Mardi Gras

Possibly you remember that the ladies who had charge of the Mardi Gras last year went to particular pains to announce that all sorts and conditions of men and women would be welcomed on payment of the entrance fee. Possibly you recall too that on that occasion monde and demimonde vied in the purchase of vintage wines for the good of charity which covers a multitude of sins. You may also be aware that some of our young society chaps—and some not so young—shocked their mothers, their sweethearts and their wives by mingling in the giddy dance as the partners of certain fair but frail ones who are never, never seen at assemblies, bridge parties, concerts or teas. Well, there was a great todo when sober Lenten reflection succeeded the hectic thoughtlessness of Shrove Tuesday and the result of that year-old todo will be observed in the Mardi Gras this year. The good ladies who are patronizing the charitable masquerade this year —they include Mrs. Latham McMullin, Mrs. Norris Davis, Mrs. Will and Mrs. Gus Taylor, Mrs. Laurance Scott, Mrs. George Cameron, Mrs. Worthington Ames and Mrs. Walter Martin—have decided that even charity is not sufficient excuse for letting down the bars to everybody. So the frail beauties who made last year's Mardi Gras piquant—to put it mildly—will be invited to stay away. The masque will be a perfectly respectable masque if the ladies have their way. Hilarity will mince its steps in a hobble gown. There will be no visions in tights as there were a year ago. Heavens, no! Joy will not be too unconfined. There will be less champagne, but more discretion. And when Ash Wednesday dawns there will be fewer explanations for the sportive men who were hard put to it last year to drape their exuberant familiarities in plausible excuses. Lent, you see, is to begin with as little sackcloth and ashes as possible.

The Catholic Charity Affair

A great success indeed was the vaudeville of the Catholic Settlement and Humane Society. The Central accommodated a representative gathering of the faithful. They were all there, from old Tom Bergin to the most recent convert. Both factions in the current dispute as to the celebration of St. Patrick's Day made it a point of honor to be well represented, hostilities being suspended for the occasion. The clergy were out in force with Archbishop O'Connell the cynosure of all eyes. And everybody was in gala attire. Not since the Kirmess has the Central shone with such modish splendor. Charity became a cheerful duty in such pleasant surroundings. The patronesses in their boxes beamed complete satisfaction as they surveyed the throng and the throng was tickled to death with everything that happened on the stage. Good humor should always accompany one to a charity vaudeville, but in this instance it was not strained for there was a deal of excellence in the bill. There was only one disappointment—Mrs. Camille D'Arville Crellin was prevented by illness from singing. Otherwise the program was carried through without a hitch and at eleven everybody went downtown to supper in the best of spirits.

A Varied Program

Curiosity centered in the two numbers contributed by what I heard a chap near me describe as "our simon-pure society folk." He meant Mrs. Jack Spreckels' specialty with a double sextet and the tableau vivant arranged by Frank McComas. As usual Mrs. Spreckels made the most of her small voice and was voted a "perfect dear" in her wedding gown and veil. But slightly made-up she blushed prettily when her dancing elicited applause. Like the groom at a wedding the young men in the double sextet were overlooked; everybody being interested in the girls. And a very pretty picture they made. Little Flossie Cluff was promptly pronounced "cute" and there could be no doubt about her winsome charm. I heard an animated dispute as to who was the prettiest of these girls and Florence Braverman received a good many votes. But Edith Metcalfe, Frances Stewart, Lurline Matson and Margaret Doe all had their staunch supporters, not without reason for all are attractive youngsters. The young chaps who acted as partners to this half dozen girls were of assorted sizes and of dubious handsomeness. But nobody minded that. There were nine Grecian robed models in the tableau, "The Dreamers" and they dreamed with open eyes in semi-demi-darkness. When the light was turned on there was a lot of applause, for they were all undeniably handsome. Probably Anna Peters and Mrs. Frank Preston and Ethel Gregg attracted the most attention. The last is fast overtaking her elder sister Enid in beauty and vivacious expression. A wonderful pair are these Gregg girls. Two other numbers deserve special mention. Six tiny little ladies of the average age of seven, I should judge, charmed everybody with their dancing and were recalled several times. It was as dainty a number as could be imagined. Mrs. William J. Leet and Mr. Arthur Weiss gave a harp and 'cello duet and were vociferously encored. I must not forget to mention Dr. Frank Rudolph who was among the participants. In the past I have said several rude things about our village cutup Larry Harris. I hereby transfer half of them to Rudolph and nominate him for membership in the Family Club.

Who Broke the Spring Board?

The question of the moment in clubdom—and a most momentous question—is, Who broke the spring board in the Pompeiian natatorium of the Pacific-Union Club? Dire suspicions cloud the reputations of several of the club's weightiest members, but so far there has been no definite accusation. It may be that the culprit will un-bosom himself of a confession and thus clear the atmosphere. Meanwhile the Sherlock Holmes' of the Pacific-Union are concentrating their analytical powers upon the problem and have discovered a promising clue. It has been ascertained by reference to the interesting volumes of the great engineer Trautwine that the spring board could easily withstand a weight of three hundred pounds. Ergo, say the amateur sleuths, it must have been broken under the weight of some member who tips the scales somewhere beyond three hundred. This deduction has caused a sensation in the club. It will be remembered that the great Tom Reed once declared that no gentleman weighed more than three hundred pounds. I believe President Taft has indorsed the dictum. Is it possible then that there are in the Pacific-Union Club certain persons of a ponderosity which precludes their being gentlemen? The importance of finding the man who smashed the spring board sinks to insignificance before this distressing aspect of the affair. It is being freely predicted that when the criminal is unearthed the severest punishment will be meted out to him. As the hunt is narrowing to the heaviest heavyweights in the club, there is little doubt that the punishment will soon be inflicted. The culprit will be compelled to bant.

The Orchid Lady

Mrs. Joseph Coryell, "the orchid lady," made famous by George Sterling through the medium of a poem that was published for the first time in Town Talk, has excited somebody's envy, as is evident from the fact that the correspondent of a New York society journal has been indulging the spirit of satire at her expense. After telling all about Mrs. Coryell's social progress from the time that she became a resident of Menlo and of her entrance to the holy of holies personally conducted by the Percy Moores and the McDonald Spencers, the correspondent says: "There is just one annoyance which Mrs. Coryell finds herself facing as a society woman—her affairs will get into the society columns of the dailies and weeklies. This exasperates her in the extreme for she is about the only person known to the society reporter who will not give her guest lists. And her threats to the maitres d'hotel of the Fairmont, Palace and St. Francis are truly terrifying when she admonishes them." If there is anybody whose social affairs when pulled off at one of the big hotels do not get into the society columns I'd like to know who the person is.

A Conflict in Dates?

Why Mrs. Tevis withdrew invitations to her dinner last week is an absorbing topic in society whose devotees are wont to waste a great deal of time and thought on very unimportant things. One hundred and fifty guests received invitations to meet Miss Irwin and Mr. Crocker and a few days later these were recalled, owing to a conflict of dates, some say, while others, eager to feed the appetite for gossip, declare deeper reasons are entailed. It is ever thus—our social somebodies will insist on delving beneath the surface of trivial happenings for purely imaginary sensations. A conflict of dates there may have been but it "is said" to have been planned by a San Mateo matron who declined to change her date announced after Mrs. Tevis had selected one. Mrs. Tevis told friends that she was called unexpectedly to Bakersfield for consultation with architects and builders over details of the new residence on the Bakersfield property. In proof of this, accompanied by her sons, she left for the south Tuesday for a short absence.

Miss Irwin's Wedding Presents

The wedding gifts showered on fortunate Miss Helene Irwin are without exception the richest collection ever bestowed on a San Francisco bride. Already a private detective has been added to the Irwin entourage to guard jewels and gold plate from possible burglars. The Crocker family connection includes the Whitelaw Reids, John Wards, Ogden Mills, Earl and Countess Grannard, the younger Phipps of Pittsburg and England (Mrs. Phipps was a Mills twin), the C. B. Alexanders of New York, and the California Crockers, all of them in the multi-millionaire class and all generous in their presents to Templeton Crocker's bride who expressed a preference for jewels. They include a pearl necklace of large stones with diamonds and rubies, the latter a favorite gem of Miss Irwin, set in brooches, chains, bracelets and rings. Jennie Crocker's gift was her share of "Uplands" where the young couple will live after a summer in Europe. The Reids are delighted with their young cousin's fiancee and have invited them to be their guests in London for the coronation.

A Reid Wedding Soon

Mr. and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid who will attend the Irwin-Crocker wedding will leave California to be present at the marriage of their son, Ogden Mills Reid and Miss Helen Rogers which will take place at the home of the bride's parents in Wisconsin soon after Easter. Miss Rogers who is a graduate of Barnard College is a charming girl formerly the secretary of Mrs. Reid who has spoken affectionately of her to California friends. Young Reid and his bride will also go to London for the coronation on their honeymoon.

She Was Dickman's Wife

Mrs. Clarence Eddy who accompanied her husband to San Francisco was the first wife of J. Charles Dickman, the artist. They were divorced ten or twelve years ago but continued on amicable terms, Mrs. Dickman asserting that "Charley was all right as a friend though not a success as a husband." He has since married again however and the second venture has proved a matrimonial success. Mrs. Eddy who was married to the organist in New York was Grace Dohrman, niece of William Dohrman and the possessor of a rare contralto voice that has been heard on the concert stage.

The Future Mrs. Clay Greene

Mrs. Laura Robinson who will marry Clay Greene the play-wright in New York is described as a fascinating widow by those who have met her. She is prominent in the artistic set of New York and has a beautiful apartment in West 58th street where artists and literary people are wont to gather. There are two Misses Robinson of debutante age who will be their mother's attendants at the wedding, which owing to the comparatively recent death of Mrs. Green will be a quiet one. Clay Greene is a leading member of the Lambs Club who has been the shepherd of many of its gambols. He was the moving spirit in many Bohemian jinks years ago before New York claimed him as a resident.

Our Society Banters

The society ladies one and all are leading a most strenuous life these days. It is the fad to be sylph-like. Some few are subsisting on one frugal meal a day and are taking long walks. But rolling is the usual expedient of the figure-hunters and sometimes is carried to a most amusing extreme. One day last week a well known clubman returned home somewhat earlier than usual. What was his amazement as he opened the front door to see his dignified wife rolling from the front door to the end of the spacious hall, out of one room and into another. He was appalled and rushing up stairs called cautiously to his daughter, thinking that his wife had suddenly gone raving mad. However the daughter calmly explained that mother was simply reducing her extra avoirdupois. Those society women who find rolling too strenuous have taken to walking It is noticeable that very few of the younger members of society are seen on the street cars Miss Leslie Page, Miss Alexandra Hamilton and Mrs. James Jenkins formed an interesting trio the other day walking briskly out Sutter street with a long swinging gait which gave evidence of trained pedestrianism. I'm told that during Lent many walking parties will be given. What with fasting, walking and rolling, next season should exhibit marked changes in the appearance of many of our belles. The men too are trying to get rid of their too too solid flesh, and are getting down to regular exercise in grim earnest. I hear that several prominent men are adopting the feminine expedient of rolling, but they are very secretive about it, fearing to be found out. On the borders of society many too plump men and women reduce their flesh by climbing

It Cost Her Fifty Dollars

Whenever our ambitious society women hear a lion of the hour roaring in public they immediately cast around for some excuse to invite him to their homes as the piece de resistance for a tea or other function. Usually this proves a powerful drawing card but not infrequently it also proves an expensive mode of entertainment to the hostess. Apropos of this I have in mind an elocutionist who has recently been giving some dialect stories at the fashionable hotels to audiences of society's most prominent matrons Last week the wife of a wealthy man essayed to make this young woman the guest of honor at a tea. There were some fifty chosen ladies present. During the afternoon several of the guests who were gifted musically or otherwise contributed to the entertainment. Finally some of them approached the "guest of honor" and begged her for a recitation which was readily granted. The afternoon wore to a close and the guest of honor and the others took their departure after thanking the hospitable hostess for a most delightful afternoon. What was the surprise of the hostess the next day to receive a neatly penned note from the elocutionist, enclosing a bill for fifty dollars for her recitations the previous afternoon. She explained that she had been asked by a wealthy and prominent society lady to recite at her home during the week and that the engagement had been cancelled on account of her recitation at the tea. The society matron, it seems, did not care to have her as the novelty of her offering had been destroyed. The tea hostess will henceforward be chary about entertaining lions or lionesses.

The Vanderbilts and the Goulds

Seldom is the lid lifted from a juicy scandal in the American plutocracy without disclosing somewhere in the seething mass a Vanderbilt or a Gould. Which is probably the reason that both the Goulds and the Vanderbilts have lost their hold on the great railroad properties which they inherited from the founders of the family fortunes. How many of the millions accumulated by old Jay Gould and Commodore Vanderbilt have been thrown to the birds along the primrose path of dalliance! What vast sums have been spent by both families for the extrication of sons and daughters from unfortunate marital alliances and from the webs in which they have been caught in the riotous indulgence of their lusts! Within the last five years Anna Gould and two of her brothers have paid the price of their follies. The Vanderbilt family can be depended upon for a contribution to social scandal at least once a year. It was but a little over a year ago that Willie K. Jr. whose father's matrimonial experience was tragic, was about to lose his wife on account of his devotion to an actress, and now Alfred G. Vanderbilt is figuring in the scandal that grew out of the divorce of the beautiful Mrs. McKim who played a star part in Reno some months ago. Vanderbilt, it is said, was to have been sued for alienating the lady's affections, but the ex-hausband being a plutocrat and a man of sound business principles settled the little matter out of court. Mrs. McKim is now in all probability preparing for a second marriage and a social campaign in Newport.

Gossip of the Theatre

Hofmann at the Piano

Liszt, Rubinstein, Paderewski, d'Albert, de Pachmann and now Hofmann, the great, glorious modern geniuses of the piano! Sunday afternoon Josef Hofmann, the youngest, the latest of the heaven-born band held a large, reverential audience spellbound at the Columbia Theater. He played a group of Beethoven creations. As was to be expected from one who had sat at the feet of Rubinstein, perhaps the greatest interpreter of Beethoven, his playing was remarkable for depth of feeling and volume of tone. The closing number of the group was one of Rubinstein's favorite concert Beethoven numbers—the funeral march from "Ruins of Athens." Beginning with "the blaring splendor of a complete band it melted away in the distance in 'a sound so fine that nothing lived 'twixt it and silence.'" In the Chopin numbers he was equally happy, playing with fingers light as feathers yet strong as the mighty hills, now cheering the heart and making one long to sing, to dance, and again soothing the spirit into serenest calm. Then came a splendid series of modern Russian music played with marvelous execution and joyousness of spirit making one realize that the quiet, serious looking performer is but in the noon of glad life, and calling to mind

"In youth the heart exults and sings,
The pulses leap, the feet have wings."

Josef Hofmann has not one spectacular mannerism, he employs no adventitious aid to popularity, but he does not fail to electrify his audience. He walks on modestly, and scarcely ever even glances at his listeners. But he plays and that is enough. We are a nation of pianists —so foreigners say. In other countries some of the children learn the violin, the cornet, the flute for a change, but here every member of the family has to have a try at the piano. Frequently the results are hair-raising but on the whole it perhaps explains why an American audience at the piano recital of a great artist is most intelligently appreciative. So many have studied that they know what to observe, what to appreciate. To any one who has devoted years and labor to the study of the piano, it is exasperating to hear others refer flippantly to "its limitations." Study long enough and devoutly enough and you will become conscious of its potentialities, of what may be born at the touch of a Hofmann's magic fingers. You will have the poet's vision and insight, the poet who sang:

The blue eggs in the robins' nest
Will soon have wings and beak and breast,
And flutter and fly away.

"The Midnight Sons"

The name of the offering at the Savoy has a real devilish sound. It suggest gilded youths who make the night boisterous with their spending and retire to their couches when respectable merchants, insurance clerks and ribbon salesmen are hurrying to their daily toil. It conjures pictures of rakish but handsome young fellows with their silk hats tilted over one eye and the other eye winking at pretty chorus girls, spilling champagne and hundred dollar bills and engaging taxies without regard to expense. "The Midnight Sons," you feel, will show you "the real life" and put you on speaking terms with the sports of Broadway and Forty-second street, localities which you are supposed to know as well as Powell and Market. But "The Midnight Sons" is a good deal of a delusion and a snare. It is really a vaudeville show with the various stunts strung on a thin thread of negligible plot. It is a vehicle for the exploitation of the leg feminine. It is full of chorus girls and chorus boys. But the interest centers in the vaudeville stunts. There is a toe dancer of average ability and a young woman who does acrobatic dancing of a very praiseworthy sort. There is a monologist who dresses as a fat woman and gets his effects from the power of his lungs. There is also a thin woman who acts as the fat woman's foil and gets no effects at all. There is a woman who sings pretty well and a soubrette who satisfies the eye. There are men who try to sing and a youth who stutters. There is a theater set on the stage, a very ingenious contrivance, for when the real audience fails to applaud the mock audience may be depended on to applaud most lustily. Thus the illusion, if not the reality of enthusiasm is flung around the show and it goes off with a hip-hurrah. There is really nothing to complain of in "The Midnight Sons," nothing to invite the attacks of criticism. It is the sort of thing to please those who like this sort of thing—and all others need not apply.

—Edward F. O'Day.

Gus Thomas, Press Agent

"As a Man Thinks," Augustus Thomas' most recent play, has been placed in rehearsal in New York. The piece originally was entitled "The Jew," and is the "great play," with a refined, generous Jew as the central character, which Mr. Thomas predicted long ago would some time be written. At least, Mr. Thomas hopes this is the one. In conjunction with this play, by the way, mere onlookers and noncombatants are of the opinion that the same Augustus Thomas, by one brilliant stroke, established himself as the most finished press agent of the era. Mr. Thomas had in contemplation—and perhaps in the process of construction—a play based on the Jew, when he was called upon to address the graduating class of the Empire School of Acting. He chose for his topic the value of the Jew as dramatic material, and in his facile, convincing way declared that the real, big drama of our generation would deal with that subject. Every newspaper in New York printed reports of his speech, and writers on the drama all over the country commented upon it. When the theatrical producers had been impressed sufficiently and were yearning for such a play, Thomas sold one of them "The Jew."

Ethel Barrymore's New Stunt

In the presence of Charles Frohman, Charles Dillingham, William Harris and a number of other theatrical managers, Ethel Barrymore has just tried a novel experiment in the way of rehearsing plays. Miss Barrymore proceeded on the principle that a play, to be produced properly, should appeal equally to the eye and the ear, and after her novel attempt the managers who were watching declared that they would follow the new method hereafter. Miss Barrymore first rehearsed Barrie's one-act play, "The Twelve Pound Look." A thin, black curtain was lowered, behind which the players went through their parts, in order to determine if it was possible to force the dramatic movement of the piece over the footlights to the audience beyond. Next the curtain was raised, and the company acted their roles in pantomime. The same test was applied also to an act of "Alice-Sit-by-the-Fire." "I believe," said Miss Barrymore, after the rehearsal, "that it is impossible to get good results from a play unless it is made to appeal equally to the eye and ear. Hereafter in trying out plays I shall test them both ways. You've no notion, until you try it, what an infinite number of profitable suggestions one gets from the new method."

A Grandson of Samuel Lover

Victor Herbert, the composer whose latest work is the music of Joe Redding's "Natoma," is a grandson of Samuel Lover, the Irish novelist, poet and song writer. Speaking of his great relation Herbert recently said: "You know I lived with my grandfather when I was a boy, and a fine old man he was. It was then that I got my first love for music. My mother was an excellent musician, and best of all she loved the old Irish melodies. What melodies they are! I have nearly a thousand of them here in my drawer, each one more beautiful than the next. Only the other day John McCormack was up here, and sitting down at the piano began to sing some of them. I think he sang the whole afternoon. He might have sung the whole night, and no one would have been tired."

Squelching a Lothario

Madam Gadski's husband is Lieutenant Tauscher, who is the American agent of a celebrated foreign manufactory of fire-arms. That circumstance gave the diva a chance to reprimand a flirtatious Grand Duke, who pestered her with his very pressing attentions and intentions last summer at Salzburg. In desperation Madam Gadski presented Tauscher to His Highness. "Ah! your husband," remarked the Grand Duke, monocling the lieutenant; "what does he do?" "He shoots," came Madam Gadski's answer swiftly and meaningly. His Highness then faded away.

"Madame Sherry" at the Columbia

"Madame Sherry" comes to the Columbia on Monday night. Already the playhouse has been flooded with requests for reservations, so interest is evidently keen. In book and music, in cast, chorus, orchestra and stage production, "Madame Sherry" is said to be immense. In the company are such celebrities as Oscar Figman, Ann Tasker, Lottie Kendall and Cheridah Simpson. It is needless to remind readers that "Every Little Movement Has a Meaning All Its Own," is one of the songs.

The Bonci Concerts

For the first time one of the world's greatest operatic tenors is to appear here in recital, not merely singing a few operatic numbers but interpreting a complete program of classic and modern songs. Alessandro Bonci will give his first concert Sunday afternoon, March 5, at the Columbia. The program will delight every music lover for it embraces many of the world's greatest "lieder" as well as operatic gems. The second and positively last concert will be given the Sunday following with another beautiful list of songs and arias. Harold Osoorn Smith, last here with David Bispham, will be the accompanist. The sale of seats will open at Sherman, Clay & Co's Wednesday morning.

ELBERT HUBBARD

Fra Elbertus of the Philistine who will appear this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum.

"The Girl" at the Alcazar

Evelyn Vaughan and Bertram Lytell's engagement at the Alcazar will conclude next week with an elaborate production of "The Girl of the Golden West." It will be the third revival in Sutter street of Belasco's play of pioneer life in California. Miss Vaughan will again have the role of "The Girl." As the road agent who gets The Girl's first kiss and is reformed by it Bertram Lytell will be seen at his best. Will R. Walling will repeat his convincing impersonation of Jack Rance, the sheriff-gambler and Howard Hickman will again be effective as Sonora Slim. There are thirty-nine speaking parts in the cast, and the scenic equipment is great.

Hofmann's Farewell

Josef Hofmann, one of the most fascinating pianists of the present time, has been delighting large audiences during the past week. He will give his farewell concert this Sunday afternoon at the Columbia, presenting a program so attractive that it will be difficult for any real music lover to resist the temptation of hearing it. Among the offerings will be the rarely played "Fantasie" in C major (three movements) by Robert Schumann.

The Fra at the Orpheum

Elbert Hubbard, the sage of East Aurora, will be seen at the Orpheum next week. He will deliver a twenty minute "heart to heart talk" with "his flock" as he calls his audience. Bird Millman will appear with her wire artists. Miss Millman is styled "The Eva Tanguay of the Air." She is well known here. Back again come the Empire Comedy Four. Their act will consist of a miniature musical comedy entitled "What's the Answer?" Walter Graham will present a novelty called the "manikin music hall." Next week will be the last of Boudini Brothers, Welch, Mealy and Montrose, Lawrence and Fitzgerald and Helena Frederick and company in "The Tales of Hoffman."

Gertrude Elliott Coming

"The Midnight Sons" will begin its second and last week at the Savoy this Sunday evening, with the usual matinees on Thursday and Saturday. Gertrude Elliott in Frances Hodgson Burnett's play of cheerfulness, "The Dawn of a Tomorrow," will begin a week's engagement at the Savoy Sunday night, March 5.

Busoni the Pianist Coming

Ferrucio Busoni, the famous Italian pianist who created a furore in the East such as has not been known since the advent of Paderewski, has been secured for two concerts by Manager Greenbaum. He is not only a marvelous pianist but a great orchestral composer and his works are being played by the world's greatest symphony orchestras. Busoni will play here twice and there will be no concert in Oakland. The dates are March 19 and 21.

Ye Liberty to Give "The Right of Way"

The Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will be the first stock company to present "The Right of Way," which will be their attraction next week. It is the dramatization by Eugene Presbrey of Sir Gilbert Parker's tale of the same title. In preparing it for stage use Presbrey has contrived a series of dramatic scenes that are full of color and human interest. Sydney Ayres will have the role of Charley Steele. Henry Shumer that of Joe Portugais and Muriel Hope is to be seen as Rosalie, while the thirty or more remaining characters will all be in capable hands. The company will next be seen in "When Knights Were Bold."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Sctoks—The market during the past week was subject to a sharp reactionary movement engineered by manipulative banking interests, undoubtedly for the purpose of clearing the speculative situation in Wall Street in preparation for the important Supreme Court decisions in which it is not an improbability that one of the large Trust cases may be heard from; also the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific merger suit and the railway rate decisions. Timid operators threw over their commitments early in the week on the decline and these stocks have apparently passed into strong hands. It can also be said that the buying in the closing days was of a character not to be ignored in considering the immediate future course of values. For the long pull in securities we feel optimistic.

Wheat—Normal crop conditions on the abnormally large seeded wheat acreage were restored by last week's continued and liberal rains in the southwest. The effectual breaking of the drought wiped out the last hope of speculators that wheat values could be maintained on a strictly domestic basis and that no export outlet was needed. Downward drifting values in the face of heavy covering by shorts showed that the hedged commercial supply had not yet found a firm resting place, although much of the weight of this load was transferred from the May to the new crop deliveries, chiefly July. Old crop supplies loomed large and burdensome and in view of the prospect of a bumper crop soon, will have to be taken care of. Fortunately foreign markets declined less rapidly than did the American and there was little progress toward an opening of the clogged export channels. Part of the firmness abroad was due to the severe weather in southern Europe which promised to delay shipments from Russia. Attempts to stir the trade with war and European plague scares had only a momentary effect. The absence of material demand from millers and the evidence that the latter were already overloaded with wheat or its product had their influence on the situation. Wealthy and successful speculators were putting out short lines of July last week, following the rain in the southwest.

Corn—Wet weather all over the greater part of the corn belt last week, with prospect of light arrivals at terminal markets this week, helped to sustain corn prices despite the slump in wheat. There was a fair volume of business done for export but the prices realized left a margin which was not tempting to most of the big interests here. Last week's receipts here were nearly four million bushels and were two and one-half millions bushels more than were shipped out.

Cotton—The trend of prices in the cotton market during the past week was downward from the start. Private wires reported general rains all over the State of Texas and there is now no further argument that can be advanced in support of the drouth territory in Texas or Oklahoma as this factor has been entirely eliminated for the present at least. There is now nothing to interfere with the pitching of a record acreage which we have every reason to expect. There is more money to be made by raising cotton at 14 cents per pound than by any other crop that can be produced in any part of the cotton belt. As for the old crop, the trade is beginning to realize that there is more than enough cotton to go round. The poor state of trade all over the world is forcing spinners and manufacturers to curtail to a greater extent than last year. Assuming that spinners' takings are as large during the next 23 weeks as for the same time last year we should start the next season with the largest visible supply in the history of cotton. With next crop options selling at a discount of 130 points purchases of May and July options at prevailing high levels are no investment, to say the least, and we therefore recommend a sale on all strong markets.

world—a dubious sort of compliment when you come to think it over. However, that work got Polk interested in schemes for municipal adornment and when he went to Chicago in 1900 to join D. H. Burnham's architectural force, he carried a lot of ideas which found a sympathetic lodgment in Burnham's mind, for Burnham has always made a hobby of just that sort of thing. When Polk left San Francisco all the architects said he would never come back and when he came here with Burnham in 1906 they added that he couldn't come back. When Burnham made him the business manager of his local office, they chortled at the joke of the thing; when Burnham made him a partner, they simply held their sides; when Burnham turned over his local business to him, they began to sit up and take notice. In the past four years Polk has erected buildings of a total value of more than eight million dollars, so the architects are beginning to revise their early ideas about him. Of course not all the architects joined in the symphony of dispraise, so not all the architects find it necessary to recant. But when Polk sits at that banquet board in the club which he built, maybe there won't be a few of his fellow craftsmen who will squirm in their seats—if they are fortunate enough to attend—when the toastmaster, consulting his notes or his pencilled cuff, introduces "a man wha is fit to be compared with the great Vitruvius, a man who continues the glorious traditions of the brilliant school of Brunelleschi and Sansovino, a man whose name will go ringing down the ages with the names of Bramante and Vignola and Palladio, aye, with the immortal name of Michel-Angelo. Gentlemen, our architect, Willis Polk." Prolonged applause folowed by "He's a Jolly Good Fellow."

spiteful insinuation of your friend, perhaps your adversary last evening at the club, who hates you because you won from him a few hundred francs?"

In time, as Carlo's persistent good luck continued, the most innocent remarks seemed to Anna to be full of significance and injurious intent.

She suffered most when they were at social gatherings. Every time she was approached torture assailed her and she would ask herself: "Does he know what is being whispered about Carlo? It may be someone who was among the very first to hint and gossip about him! And what is he thinking about me? Have I awakened his pity, or his amusement? The latter, probably. People are so spiteful!"

If her husband stood for an instant alone in the crowded room, she wondered whether he were being avoided. Did he appear worried or uneasy, she thought perhaps he had overheard the whispered innuendoes which he pretended to ignore; but if he joined in the general merriment, she was overwhelmed with shame for herself and for him, who either knew nothing or did not wish to admit his knowledge.

Finally the pleasure she was wont to take in the flattering remarks about her pretty clothes became pain at the horrid idea: "Do they think that Carlo buys them for me with money won at cards?"

Once, unable to bear it any longer, she threw herself into his arms sobbing: "Don't play any more! Oh, promise me you won't play any more!"

"Even if I wanted to stop I couldn't now," he replied tranquilly.

"Why not?"

"Because it would not be fair to my friends who have lost. I'll quit, I promise you, when I begin to lose."

"But you will never lose, never!" Anna cried despairingly.

"Let us hope so," he said with a laugh. "The fever breaks us all in the end, you know. But you are my mascot."

She drew back from him violently, indignant at the idea that he probably boasted thus of her to others.

Perceiving her attitude, he asked: "Would you prefer that I should lose?"

"Should I prefer it!" she exclaimed.

"You are very foolish," he remarked, lighting a cigarette.

"But don't you understand that if you continue to win they will say—" she stopped short, avoiding the abyss.

"They will say?" he repeated, looking at her and becoming suddenly serious.

"Oh, nothing. I don't know. I just said it to say something," she murmured brokenly, closing her eyes to escape his.

"I advise you to think of what you are going to say another time before you speak," he said coldly.

"But I did not think anything, believe me," she faltered, bewildered.

"So much the better."

And he went out.

Anna remained standing in the middle of the room, paralyzed with fear.

How had she happened to think for a moment of revealing to him her secret? Had she not understood from the first that he would wish to trace the rumor to its source—to kill someone or to be killed?

Strange to say, the certainty of this intention, which for the first time she had just read in Carlo's eyes, frightened her and also filled her with a foolish discomfiting pride. Carlo had seemed to her so fine in that attitude; so dignified. With what expression he had repeated her words: "They will say!" Now, more than ever, must she be silent, lest she drive him with her own hand toward the irrevocable.

One day when they were out walking together they caught sight of an old friend of Carlo's. To Anna's surprise her husband looked in the opposite direction to avoid bowing to him.

"I have my reasons for cutting him," he replied to Anna's question, and he related to her how this Renato Salvestri had been for sometime attentive to a lady much older than himself and how somebody, to explain the strange anomaly, had gone about making base charges against him.

"Who?" asked Anna.

"Who? Tizio, Coia, Sempronio—everyone, in fact. However, he had the good fortune to find a friend, sincere and affectionate, who warned him——"

"Oh, you call him a friend?"

"Surely," exclaimed Carlo, pausing in his walk. "Should I not call a friend the man who said to me, 'Take care of yourself! There is someone lying in wait to hit you treacherously behind your back!' Well, Renato found him, this friend, but instead of doing what any gentleman would have done in his place, he paid no attention to him at all."

"But if he did not know the name of the person who started the slander, ought he, according to you, to have challenged all of them?" Anna's voice was weak with emotion.

"It was only necessary for him to pick a quarrel with one who would represent that world which shot the poisoned arrow of anonymous insult. Naturally, in such a case a man chooses as an adversary one who for some reason or other—who of us has not a secret enemy?—is glad enough to see the point of his sword. Thus two birds are killed with one stone."

He spoke clearly, dryly, as a man convinced of his facts.

Anna's tongue was tied by these words, for had he not found such a friend one day? Was it not surprising that as yet he had challenged no one in order to fulfil this duty, if duty it really were? And what reason could he have, unless——?

She shook with a sudden chill; a cloud obscured her mind. She had the sensation that her husband was living in a fearful moral solitude, and an immense pity for him, which until now she had never felt, overwhelmed her.

Very well, then! Now that everything else around him was silent she, she alone, would speak plainly.

But suppose Carlo had already turned a deaf ear, as had Renato Salvestri? No, that was impossible. What he would have done was clear. Now she herself felt the necessity that her husband should slap someone in the face in public. Her woman's fury aroused, she exulted strangely at the thought of this resounding challenge which would vindicate himself and her at the same time.

That same evening while she was waiting for Carlo to come home, more nervous than usual because she had made up her mind to speak, he burst into the room, pale, disordered. A horrible presentiment choked her.

"What has happened?" she asked running to him.

"Anna! Anna! If you but knew!"

"Speak, speak!"

She put her hands on his shoulders and drew him to her as if to comprehend more quickly his incoherent words. But he hesitated, slightly dazed.

"Speak!"

"Cursed luck! I have lost, Anna, lost a tremendous amount!"

"Oh, at last!" Anna burst forth, unable to contain herself.

His eyes hardened and, pointing his finger at her, he grumbled: "You, too, then, are pleased?"

"Who else?" she stammered, her face blanching.

"Everyone. I don't know. Everyone who reviled my luck. Oh, how right you were to say 'Do not play!' I ought to have stopped when I was winning and have enjoyed the money with you. Stupid, my scruples! Fool, fool, fool!" he cried, striking his head with his clenched hands. "But they, the dogs, they had no scruples with me! They have taken from me not only what I have won, but two hundred thousand francs more—half our fortune! Anna, Anna, do you understand? I have ruined you! I have ruined you!"

He fell on the divan, shaking with tearless sobs. Then, as he raised his eyes and saw Anna's radiant face, he bounded to his feet, beside himself with fury.

"And why are you glad?" he roared. "Why? Why?"

He seized her wrists with a grip of iron.

"I am not. I assure you that I am not!" she wailed.

"Yes, you are! For a long time I have not seen you look as you do now, when you should be weeping and upbraiding me. Why are you glad, Anna? Answer me! By God! You shall answer!"

All of a sudden there flashed into his mind the remembrance of that evening long ago when Anna had murmured her timid "They will say—" and he had interrupted her with contemptuous indifference.

Stooping over her he held her to him with all the strength of his arms, hissing between his teeth, while a terrible light gleamed in his eyes: "They said it, eh? That's what they said! Is it true? Is that it? And now you are glad because they cannot say it anymore—is that the reason? And you knew it and held your tongue! Instead of crying it out at me, of forcing me to hear—me who had every right to know, who ought not to have been left in ignorance—you kept silent! You, like all the rest! Because I was not worth telling, I suppose! I did not deserve to know! Oh, go away, you creature without love, without pride! You make me shudder!"

He pushed her away brutally and, covering his face with his hands, burst into bitter tears. Nothing was heard in the room but the sound of weeping and the crackling of the fire.

Suddenly he pulled himself together and wiped away the tears, pressing his fingers on his eyes. He took two or three turns up and down the rooms, then planted himself in front of Anna, demanding in a voice at which she trembled with terror and delight—the voice which she had dreamed of hearing before: "His name! Out with it!"

"I don't know! I don't know it," she stammered confused.

"Tell me his name, I say!"

"Carlotta Moretti, she was the first, but for our good——"

"Carlotta Moretti!" repeated Carlo shrilly, as if to recall her to her senses by the sound. "And what did she say?"

"Nothing, really! She only hinted at the gossip. But what it was exactly, she didn't explain—I didn't understand. It did not exist, probably, except in her brain, or in mine."

In fact, all the vague phrases which her imagination had elaborated, all the poison which she had absorbed so conscientiously and sorrowfully, appeared to her at this moment innocuous; she marveled that they should have been able to acquire so fatal a power over her.

Carlo laughed derisively.

"Carlotta Moretti! No, it was not she! She only repeated something others had said. Moreover, she meant no harm; she repeated it without thinking. Who can tell from whom she heard it—who knows where?"

And Anna, grasping at these two sentences as at an anchor of salvation, repeated:

"Yes, who can tell from whom? Who knows where? And in any case, even if anyone had heard, now they understand the infamy of it. It reflects on themselves. Anyway, I don't believe it. Besides, what does it matter? If one paid attention to all of the gossip, there would be plenty of duels! Yes, I tell you, one does not need to concern oneself with what the world may say when one's conscience is clear; one should rise above it."

She spoke hurriedly, eager to convince him.

She was surprised and encouraged that he did not interrupt her. Indeed, when she ceased speaking and raised her eyes to his she saw that he was smiling:

"You are right. If one were obliged to lend an ear to all the gossip in this world! You said it well. Let us not bother ourselves about it. I regret the two hundred thousand lire, but since you are pleased——" He laughed sarcastically and looked at his watch.

"By the way, I have an appointment. I'll be back in time for dinner. Don't forget you are going to the theater." And he left her.

"Coward!" she hissed through her teeth when she was alone. But at the same time she told herself that the life of her husband, whom she adored, was well worth two hundred thousand francs.

Two days later, in Carlotta Moretti's drawing-room, the only subject of conversation was the tragic duel between Selmi and De Mari, in which the latter had been killed.

For no apaprent reason he had provoked a quarrel with Selmi and insisted that his seconds should accept the most severe conditions.

It was a pity—such a good fellow—and that poor Anna, a widow at twenty-five.

Carlotta Moretti repeated for the one hundredth time, "By the way, I was there just two weeks ago on her Tuesday. Who would ever have thought of this then? I remember, it was raining and she, poor thing, begged me to remain until it cleared. I had foolishly dismissed my carriage and on that very day I was wearing for the first time a dress from Pantini's—six hundred francs! Her prices are getting more absurd every day!"

One of the ladies then said:

"Advise Anna to try La Bosis for her mourning. She has good taste and is not very expensive."

An Interesting Antique

"Fine old inn, sir," commented the host. "Everything in this house has its story."

"I don't doubt it," remarked the grouchy tourist "And is there any legend connected with this old piece of cheese?"

"I'm so sorry about it, but my husband actually hates music."

"How strange!"

"Isn't it. His prejudice is so strong that he has to jump up and leave the theatre whenever [illegible] orchestra is playing an entr'acte."

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 30,018, Department No. 4.

MARY I. GREELY, Plaintiff, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to All Persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Mary I. Greely, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County within three (3) months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the Westerly line of Twentieth Avenue, distant thereon one hundred and seventy-five (175) feet North of Geary Street (formerly Point Lobos Avenue), running thence Northerly along said Westerly line of Twentieth Avenue twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles westerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Southerly twenty-five (25) feet; and thence at right angles Easterly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to the point of commencement; being a portion of Outside Lands Block Number 201.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: judgment of said Court which shall ascertain, determine and adjudge all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said real property and every part thereof, and which shall ascertain, determine and adjudge that plaintiff is the owner in fee simple absolute and in the actual and peaceable possession of said real property and every part thereof, and that her title thereto is forever established and quieted.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 31st day of December, A. D. 1910.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 33,681, Dept. No. 10.

PLINY E. RITNER, Plaintiff, vs. GRACE I. RITNER, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, Send Greeting to: Grace I. Ritner, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion of plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Commencing on the Northerly line of Pine Street at a point distant one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches Westerly from the Westerly line of Broderick Street; thence Westerly along the Northerly line of Pine Street twenty-seven (27) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles Easterly twenty-seven (27) feet and six inches; and thence at right angles Southerly and parallel with said line of Broderick Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement. Being a portion of Fifty (50) Vara Lot Number Two (2), in Block No. 540 as designated upon a certain map entitled "Hoadley's Extension of the Western Addition," which said map was recorded May 10, 1862, in the office of the Recorder of said City and County.

2nd. Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Southerly line of Geary Street (formerly Point Lobos Avenue) with the Easterly line of Second Avenue; thence Southerly along said line of Second Avenue one Hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles Easterly Thirty-two (32) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred (100) feet to the Southerly line of Geary Street; thence at right angles Westerly along said line of Geary Street thirty-two (32) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement; being part of Outside Lands Block No. 283.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer the plaintiffs will apply to the Courts for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: judgment of said Court which shall ascertain, determine and adjudge all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said real property and every part thereof, and which shall ascertain, determine and adjudge that plaintiffs are the owners in fee simple absolute and in the actual and peaceable possession of said real property and every part thereof, and that their title thereto is forever established and quieted.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 31st day of December, A. D. 1910.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 32,385.

ADELE NOVARESE, Plaintiff, vs. JOSEPH ROBERT NOVARESE, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, Send Greeting to Joseph Robert Novarese, Defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed herein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 26th day of October, A. D. 1910.

Auto Notes

Charles Feltman of Brooklyn, who bought the first Lozier car ever sold, has just placed his order with the factory for a 1911 Lozier limousine, while his brother Alfred who bought the second Lozier sold has ordered another of the 1911 make.

One of the neatest compliments ever paid an automobile was expressed by C. H. Smith of Madison, Fla., in a telegram to the Hudson Motor Car Company of Detroit. Mr. Smith wired to tell of a 328-mile run he had just made from Atlanta to Madison over good, bad and indifferent roads of hills and sand. "The engine kept cool all the way," he said, "and ran so quiet, I could have slipped upon a covey of birds with it."

Eastern reports state that Cyrus Cobb has won the Chalmers car offered by Hugh Chalmers for the highest baseball batting average. Cobb, previous to winning the Chalmers, had had automobile experience, having been an ardent motorist for some years.

According to advices forwarded to the Pioneer Automobile Company from John L. Poole who is looking after the Lozier interests in Buenos Ayres, a decided demand has developed in that territory for American made machines. During previous years French cars have held a notable lead over other makes in South America but at present the autos built in this country, and especially those of the highest grade, are coming to the fore and already have achieved a position of preference.

The Haynes Auto Sales Company reports the sale of a 1911 Haynes car to Dr. George Lee Eaton who is president of the Board of Health. The Doctor's garage already houses a Haynes of 1910 model and the satisfactory service received from the car determined him in placing his order for this season's model of the same make.

An unique ambulance is the motor ambulance presented to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals by Mrs. Russell Sage. This ambulance which is operated in New York City has in the last three years carried 326,000 dogs and cats to shelter. During that time its only tire equipment has been Diamond.

That Mrs. Leslie Carter's ambition to own the most distinctive, beautiful and costliest creation of the automobile and carriage builder's craft has at last been realized, was very apparent when her mammoth limousine was driven into place at the E. R. Thomas Motor Company's exhibit at the Buffalo Show. The interior decorations are the most expensive and gorgeous obtainable. Over $500 worth of gold lace from the original design made for the Sultan of Turkey is used. The permission to use this design was obtained by Mrs. Carter personally from the Sultan and it has been made only for these two notables. The Sultan's coat-of-arms is woven in the design every three inches. Concealed cabinets are built in each side of the car and open when a hidden spring is touched. A gold speedometer and clock are among the many lavish interior fittings and in fact all of the inside work is in gold, including manicure and toilet cases and a rare French mirror. Turkish rugs cover the floor and the car is heated electrically.

British motor car manufacturers are conceded by many to have made greater progress toward the solution of the all-important tire problem than has yet been attained by American makers. The latest tendency abroad is away from the demountable rim, an appliance used over there for a long time and a general inclination toward the detachable wheel, an improvement very similar to its American counterpart, the Rambler Spare Wheel. The Spare Wheel was introduced in America three years ago by the Rambler people and many points of vantage over the detachable rim are claimed for it. The change can usually be made more quickly with less dirt, because the attachment is made at the hub where the parts are less likely to stick than at the rim. One Spare Wheel with tire is available for any wheel whether or not tire sizes are alike. A reserve wheel is available for emergency use, and a single extra wheel adds less weight than a full equipment of demountable rims.

what better for Motoring than a

CHALMERS

Spring is now just over the hill to the south of you, or just a night's ride at most. It will be at your front door in a week or so, teasing you out to the fields, the woods and the open roads.

To gratify this ever-recurrent yearning to be out and on your way, there is nothing so good as a motor car. In a good car you can see 200 miles of country---your whole county---half your state---in a day.

It seems to be unusually fitting to have a fine new Chalmers car---beautiful in its grace of of line, smooth paint and polished glass and brass---pull up in front of your door some bright spring day, to be yours, to have and to drive. Somehow or other this seems right in keeping with the season---sort of new Easter outfit, so to speak.

Letters

"A Phantom of the Opera"

Those whose mental appetites crave what Thomas Hardy would call "a nice, ghastly, hair-on-end story" should feast full on Gaston Leroux' latest romance, "A Phantom of the Opera." Though it falls readily under the general classification of mystery stories, beyond that it is difficult to define, for though there are all the elements of a detective story, there is no detective, and though crimes and baffling occurences which should engage the attention of the police are the threads of its warp and woof, the police are barely mentioned throughout the whole narrative. Nearly every incident of any importance takes place under the roof of the opera house, and we climb to giddy heights above its dome and penetrate to the depths of its cellars, more than five stories under-ground. Though we are taken behind the scenes and introduced to the privacy of the managerial offices and assist at more than one performance; though the woman about whom the threads are entangled, and whose mysterious disappearance forms the climax of the plot is a prima donna, for all that, "A Phantom of the Opera" bears no resemblance to the usual stage story. It is French from beginning to end, and yet there is not a single episode of the type designated as Frenchy. The action moves rapidly and the reader is kept in breathless expectation of some new development every time he turns a page, which, indeed, is the condition in which managers, artists, employees and patrons find themselves during the time when the phantom seemed to hold them all in the hollow of his hand. The new managers, who took over the enterprise at the beginning of the story were hard-headed men of business, and of course nothing had been said to them about incomprehensible happenings in the building. In a general way they had heard of and laughed about the "ghost," but they were not long left in doubt about the reality of the existence of some person or power beyond their capacity to fathom, for when they attempted to ignore or refuse demands made upon them and accompanied by threats the threats were invariably fulfilled. The "ghost" demanded the exclusive use of a box which he designated; it levied a tribute of twenty thousand francs per month on the receipts of the opera, and it dictated the performance and the prima donna. One can scarcely designate any of the characters as hero or heroine, but as far as it is possible, Christine Daae, one of the prima donnas, plays the role of heroine. She is a Swedish girl of a singularly innocent and confiding nature who, after the death of her father and teacher, is left in the care of a countrywoman of her own, scarcely less sophisticated than the girl herself, whose imagination has been fed on fairy tales and folk lore until she does not realize the dividing line between fact and fiction. Her dying father had made some half-understood promise of a "Spirit of Music," and when, in the quiet of her dressing room at the opera house, a disembodied voice speaks to her and offers her instruction, having given evidence of ability and understanding, Christine accepts the manifestation as that of some supernatural visitant coming in response to her father's promise. The Unseen makes love to the girl and manifests a very human jealousy of the young Viscount de Chagny, who finally convinces her of the humanity of her mysterious dictator. The Opera of "Faust" is almost one of the "characters," for it is during the successive performances of this work that so many of the appalling incidents take place. The Unseen, naturally interested in the advancement of his pupil, first secures the absence of the prima donna who has that role, and Christine Daae, who has been singing Siebel, is given her opportunity to electrify the audience. On another occasion, desiring to have her again put forward, for of course Carlotta, as much surprised as all the rest, does not leave a second opening, the Phantom manages to leave a note, apparently delivered by magic, in which he demands that Carlotta shall find herself ill and Christine be cast for the part or else something will happen. The dictatorial demand is ignored. At the height of her triumph poor Carlotta simply croaked like a bullfrog. Again it is at a performance of Faust that the final climax is reached. The Unseen, who has ways of knowing pretty nearly everything that happens, so that there is small wonder he is half-believed to be disembodied, has exacted a promise from Christine that she will go away with him. She has promised to disappear, but with the Viscount de Chagny, immediately after the performance. His traveling carriage awaits them before the opera house, but at the very point of the performance where Carlotta's voice failed her, the invocation of the angels, the stage suddenly becomes dark. In a moment it was relighted but Marguerite had disappeared, where? how? whither? No one knew and no investigation ever revealed. M. Leroux has cleared up all the essential mysteries but unlike most of these tales of terror, the reader is left in a state of satisfaction with himself and his own perspicacity. He is not annoyed by the consciousness of obvious clues overlooked and identities almost wilfully ignored. M. Leroux has not drawn on his imagination for a setting for his weird romance, the scenes of which are laid in the Paris Grand Opera House, about thirty years ago. The immense structure, a small city in itself, was begun during the heydey of the Empire, but work was suspended while the war with Prussia was carried on. During the siege of Paris the unfinished building was used as a military storehouse and in the days of the Commune a part of it was used as a prison while a balloon station was established on the roof. It was twelve years in building, being completed with some modifications from the original plans, during the Republic. M. Leroux has made use of these interruptions and vicissitudes in adding strength to the plausibility of his plot. The cellars, which are more than fifty feet deep are built above a subterranean lake or river and there are now also three metropolitan railway tunnels one above another under the building. Fourteen furnaces warm the structure, and the gas pipes measure nine miles in length. There are more than twenty-five hundred doors and five hundred and thirty-eighth dressing rooms. A small army of employees is needed apart from those connected with the performances as characters, and given the inclination, such a character as stalks unseen through the pages of "A Phantom of the Opera" might very well terrify the simple workmen were he as gifted and unscrupulous as this Ghost. Illustrations, by Andre Castaigne, are in keeping with the text. They are in color, double page, and really illustrations, not merely pictures bound in with the print. Mechanically, this is one of the finest productions yet turned out by that excellent firm, the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

Railroad Regulation

Once more has a providential government extended its glad and gracious hand for the protection of that much abused and oppressed individual the ultimate consumer. Through the medium of that omnipotent body, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the railroads, perennial object of the politician's contumely, have been restrained from increasing the burdens of the man that eats his bread in the sweat of his face. It will be hard for him to appreciate the kindness of his protectors, for he will never know how heavy his burdens might have been, but he will have the satisfaction of knowing that the politicians are on the job and sensitive to all that concerns his welfare. He has received proof that the railroads are being regulated. They are being regulated in a way that will eventually, if not immediately, retard development, as of course capital is not so crazy as to trust itself forever to the mercy of jobchasers who sit up aloft in Washington looking for opportunities to beguile majorities. President Ripley of the Santa Fe is of the opinion that in the course of time the Government will own the railroads. This opinion seems to be well founded. From regulation to ownership is but a short step, and the drift toward socialism goes steadily on. After we have regulated the railroad magnates out of business we shall probably look to the landlord and restrain universal greed by single tax, which is the only legitimate means of putting us all on the same footing.

Diaz and His American Friends

Gradually the truth is coming out about conditions in Mexico. For a long time American newspapers and magazines, the journals, curiously enough, that muckrake the politics of this country and excite discontent and clamor for reform, have been chanting the praises of President Diaz and telling us that he is the most benevolent of rulers, the wisest of administrators. They have insisted that there was no revolution in Mexico, nothing more than sporadic acts of lawlessness inspired by small bands of tatterdemalions which would soon be broken up. For a time the end was in sight every week. And for a time the Diaz press bureau in this country was under forced draught grinding out eulogies of the benevolent despot, fascinating American readers with stories of the wonderful things that he had done for his country and explaining how grateful the people were for his many triumphs of statesmanship. Meantime the acts of lawlessnes became more frequent, the tatterdemalions increased in number and the zone of trouble grew wider and wider. Presently war correspondents were sent to the front, and American troops to the border, giving something of verisimilitude to the reports that a real revolution was raging in our adjacent Republic. Then came a press despatch from Paris embodying an interview with one Jose Lamantour telling us that in his opinion unless negotiations for peace were entered into there would be "a long wasting struggle," for "the Federal troops are no match for the cowbody insurgents"; also, that the Government must agree to grant certain reforms, among them being the abolition of the feudal system." Who is Jose Limantour? an insurgent? or cowboy? No, Jose Limantour is a representative of the Government; he is the Minister of Finance in the Diaz Cabinet. So evidently the armed protest against the benevolent despot amounts to something; evidently, too, benevolent despotism is not without its evils; there is really room for reform under the benign government of Porfirio Diaz. And there is also some food for thought in the foregoing recapitulation of current history, for thought touching the motives and mainsprings of American journalism. The leading defender of President Diaz is William R. Hearst, one of the great landlords of Mexico, the most powerful of all our molders of public opinion, a gentleman who is really a despot (and hardly a benevolent one) in his own country, and whose powers we are multiplying in proportion as we decrease the powers of those institutions that protect the mob from the poisoners of the public mind. This is the same Mr. Hearst who once pointed with pride to the fact that he precipitated this country into war with Spain, and that war it will be remembered was brought on as a result of our terrible indignation at the wrong suffered by the natives of Cuba. Mr. Hearst owned no property in Cuba and Spain had not the foresight to subsidize the American press.

Our Dictatorial Laborcrats

As was to be expected organized labor having settled nearly all important industrial questions is now bent upon improving the quality of teaching in our State university to the end that the graduates of that institution may become intellectually biased in favor of the unions in all matters affecting their welfare. After a cursory investigation of the course of study in the law school the Labor Council adopted resolutions of protest against familiarizing aspirants to the bar with the English common law, the objection being that the common law "protects property to the subordination of human rights and interests" and "has placed the interests of corporate organizations above the interests of the individual, and by the abuse of the injunction has betrayed the State and its people in the service and interest of corrupt wealth." This indictment of the common law is both serious and startling. It was probably drawn by the Hon. Andy Gallagher, a profound philosopher and a scholar of bewildering attainments. What the friends of the common law may be able to say in its defense we are hardly able to conjecture. It has been supposed that to the common law we are indebted for most of the civil guarantees which are favorable to a manly, individual, independent and ungrudged enjoyment of individual humanity, but from the Labor Council's indictment it must be inferred that the almost universal conception of the matter is inaccurate. It appears that the common law incites judges "to abuse of the injunction," which in itself is no trivial matter. The Labor Council abhors all "abuse of the injunction," and conceives that the injunction is abused every time union pickets are enjoined from smashing the head of an American wage-earner who doesn't contribute to the fat salaries of a leader of organized labor. The Labor Council is deeply concerned about the rights of the individual and sees no connection whatever between individual property and man's individuality, of which according to men once reputed to be wise, it is but the reflex in the material world around him. When the common law was in process of development it was assumed that man suffered in his individuality in the degree in which he was deprived of the possession, enjoyment, production and exchange of individual property which is coexistent with government; but the fallacy of this theory is well understood by the philosophers of the Labor Council. According to these philosophers the only man capable of suffering in his individuality is a working man, one that belongs to a union; and he actually does suffer in his individuality whenever he is restrained by injunction from beating the head off of somebody who is helping somebody else manage his property in the manner conducive to his own interest. So the common law which actually identifies property interest with individual interest must be banished from the university. Governor Johnson will please take notice and recruit the Board of Regents from the Labor Council.

Japan's Gift to San Francisco

However much we may dislike Japan we ought to be magnanimous enough to acknowledge a debt of gratitude to that country. For it is to Japan we are indebted for the World's Fair. A great deal has been said about how the fight for the Fair was won; how this shrewd citizen exercised his wonderful powers of strategy; how that Representative from Oklahoma was lured into line; how the Legislature of a certain State was stampeded for San Francisco; and how New Orleans was outmanoeuvred at the eleventh hour; but the simple, unadorned truth of the matter is that victory was achieved by reason of the support that was vouchsafed us by President Taft; and that support we should not have received had it not been deemed advisable to induce our acquiescence in the new treaty with Japan. The whole story came out in some of the Eastern papers a month ago. For example it was told in the Boston Transcript of January 28 in these words: "It has developed that before going ahead with its negotiations for a new treaty with Japan from which would be omitted the provisions expressly reserving the right of the United States to restrict Japanese immigration the Administration had taken careful steps to placate public sentiment along the Pacific Coast should alarm be felt there that the signing of the new treaty would be the signal for the influx of Orientals. The Coast senators have been led to understand that what restrictions are now actually in force under the present treaty will be tacitly continued under the new treaty, so that the practical working will be the same, while Japan's pride will be saved the humiliation of any treaty declaration on the subject." Also: "The President last November, just before Congress met, invited Hiram Johnson, the governor-elect of California to the White House, and there laid bare to him the program with regard to the treaty. He impressed Governor Johnson with his view that the time had come to satisfy Japan that our feeling toward her was wholly friendly, and that we could play a magnanimous part in the controversy over immigration which was continually breeding rumors of war and drawing the minds of both peoples so habitually to the thought of war that sooner or later the talk of war would probably bring upon us the real thing. Mr. Taft put the Governor under a promise to go home and keep his State quiet until the treaty could be ratified. He said that if the newspapers and mass-meetings broke out against Japan in any way it would cause such opposition that San Francisco would never get the Exposition." Mayor McCarthy likewise played a conciliatory part and as a consequence Mr. Tveitmoe's belligerent Asiatic League subsided, the pathway of the Administration was smoothed and the treaty went through without a hitch, and with no more uproar than Signor Caminetti, the tribune of the pee-pul could emit from his titanic lungs. And now it is a question whether we ought to be better pleased with having got the Fair than with having enabled President Taft to make the treaty. For the ratification of that treaty was a matter of the most vital importance. Until the canal is built we shall not be well prepared for war with Japan, and the truth is not to be blinked that Japan would rather have war before than after the completion of the great waterway which will enable this country to assemble the vessels of the navy in Pacific waters on short notice. So it was very fortunate for us that a means was at hand to muzzle our noisy politicians. What a great uproar they would have made had there been no alternative to submit! Consider that Jimmy Phelan obtained a hearing in but one San Francisco paper and that one the Boughten Bulletin of which he has said: "It is cheaper to buy than to own!" What a noise Jimmy would have made had the newspapers deemed it to their interest to give space to the bloviators! The treaty, of course, gives absolute satisfaction, but what a flood of oratory would have deluged us nevertheless had not the Fair been at stake! The truth of the matter is—as has long been recognized—that Japan is as anxious to keep her laboring men at home as we are to exclude them from the United States. With this object in view Japan, several years ago, gladly fell in with our wishes in regard to a system of passports as the best check on Japanese immigration to this country. Nevertheless the Phelans and the Caminettis are bleeding inwardly at the direful prospect. They cannot sleep o' nights on account of their apprehension of the awful things that may befall our altars and our firesides.

Our Incompetent Leaders

To what extent the people of this country are qualified to govern themselves democratically along the lines laid down by the Progressive school of statesmanship one may learn from the contributions to the literature of political science which are emanating from professional writers, lawyers and statesmen, of whom it is to be presumed that they have received more education than the average citizen. If it is evident these men are unlearned in the science which they discuss, have never studied the history of government, have no accurate knowledge of its principles, or of the political experiments made in divers periods of the world's history, or of the why or wherefore of any of the institutions invented by statesmen for the government of mankind, then what shall we say of the people generally who have not had even the advantage of superior mental training? If the few who have been educated after a fashion are incompetent to practice a science then surely it is not to be supposed of the illiterate masses that they are versed in its mysteries? The principles of government no more than the principles of astronomy are to be apprehended instinctively. Let it not be supposed that our system of government was devised by minds whose judgments were formed during the debates in the Constitutional Convention. The Founders were men who had experience in framing the constitutions of the States, and who as John Adams tells us in his exhaustive work "The History of Republics" had familiarized themselves with most of the material which is therein presented. Franklin, Hamilton, Jay, Jefferson, Adams, Morris and the others were profound students of political science, they were the peers of the most brilliant statesmen of Europe at the close of the eighteenth century. And it is the work of these men, of these great intellects, of these illustrious patriots, that we are asked to undo. And by whom? By the agitators of today who convict themselves out of their own mouths of utter incompetency; by men who don't even know the nature of the government they are living under. Let us take for a fair specimen of the leaders of public thought who are now diffusing the Cimmerian darkness of their ignorance, Mr. James F. Farraher, a Yreka attorney by whom a contribution was made the other day to the Examiner's symposium on the recall. Mr. Farraher is in favor of the recall, and by way of introduction he thus enlightens us: "A fact seemingly overlooked in some of the arguments offered is that in the day of Marshall and Jefferson, Democracy was an untried experiment. A century test has now placed it beyond the experimental stage." This is an observation the purpose of which does not appear from anything that follows. It is but a casual observation. Strangely enough Mr. Farraher does not perceive that it points the moral "Let good enough alone." Having made the observation he proceeds to dissent from Judge Works who favors the recall. He employs no logic, but merely asserts that Judge Works distrusts the people and for that reason he would have us distrust Judge Works. He tells us that Judge Works' attitude is un-American, and for this reason would have us conclude that Judge Works' position is untenable and the recall the logical consummation of republican government. Now if there is anything to be argued from the proposition that the democracy which was an "untried experiment" in the day of Marshall and Jefferson has been placed beyond the experimental stage by a century test, it certainly is this,—that we should not abandon it for something new and untried. But the opposite is precisely what Mr. Farraher recommends. The democracy of the day of Marshall and Jefferson is that of our Federal government which does distrust the people so far as the department of justice is concerned, for it appoints judges to the bench for life and makes them independent of the people. It is a democracy that recognizes the universally accepted principle that Justice discards party, friendship and kindred; a democracy that understands that a people cannot be free until they are first prevented from being unjust; in short, a democracy that understands why Justice is symbolized as blind. This is something that Mr. Farraher, who is probably a great man in Yreka, mayhap a molder of public opinion there, does not understand. And it is one of many things. Mr. Farraher doesn't understand his own government. He thinks it is a pure democracy, and that democracy was an "untried experiment" a century ago. Were he to read Herodotus he would learn to his surprise that the nature, advantages and inconveniences of democracy were as well understood at the time of the neighing of Darius's horse as they are at this hour. Were he to pursue the study of the classics a little further he would learn that among the lost works of Tacitus was a book on the republics that existed before the time of that historian; and he would come to know something of a democracy that existed in Carthage for five hundred years, where the chief magistrates and the one legislative body, a Senate, were elected by the people, and where the referendum was in vogue centuries before Christ. Were he to come down through the ages and study the modern democracies that were studied by our Founders, the democracies of Italy, of Spain and of Switzerland, he would perceive why the initiative and the recall were far from being blessings devoutly to be wished. By dint of hard study the motives that animated Hamilton and his confreres might gradually dawn on Mr. Farraher's perceptions, and some day he might apprehend the idea of a rational democracy the idea prevalent in the days of the Founders and still entertained by men who are really learned. This idea of democracy is not that the people themselves should govern but that they should have security for good government, and that to have this security they must retain the ultimate power in their own hands. That this is the idea which occupied the minds of the Founders we know on indisputable authority: first on the authority of our institutions of government which are manifestly checks on the sovereign power; secondly on the authority of the written words of such men as Hamilton, Adams and Jefferson which are still in print and easily accessible even to residents of Yreka. We recommend those written words to Mr. Farraher that he may read and digest and refrain hereafter from describing as un-American the attitude that bespeaks distrust of the people. We recommend them to all the Farrahers that have been contributing to the Examiner symposium and unconsciously acquainting us of the degeneracy of our bar and the crass ignorance of our publicists, who, while insisting that the masses are intelligent enough to govern, make it obvious that even the self-constituted leaders of the masses are themselves incompetent. What an amazing study has been afforded by this Examiner symposium! Men of high intellectual pretensions eager to parade their views have rushed into that symposium only to betray their ignorance. All the advocates of the recall, like the Yreka attorney, have prated about the principles of our democracy as though it were a maxim of our government that the people are qualified to exercise their judgment on all or any of the considerations that enter into political questions. And yet we have been living and prospering more than one hundred years under a system in the formation of which no maxim was more generally agreed upon than that popular government can be made stable only by the exercise of popular sovereignty through institutions that serve as a check on the passions of the masses.

Correspondence

The Washingtons

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I read in the despatches the other day that the Rev. Orville S. Reed is the nearest living blood relation of George Washington, and that he is a descendant of Jonathan Ball, a brother of Mary Ball Washington, the mother of George Washington. What's the matter with our John T. Washington who was private secretary to Mayor Bartlett and son of the Washington who was editor of the Examiner in the long ago? John T. Washington is a direct descendant of a brother of George Washington. John T. Washington is now superintendent of a mine near Virginia City.

Yours truly,

Definitions

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I have read your definition of "standpatter," and I fancy that your readers will appreciate these two definitions as recently given by the New York Sun:

"Standpatter, (n.): A politician who finds the Payne-Aldrich tariff good enough for him; an unrepentant, unregenerate high protectionist; in a derivative and rhetorical sense, an old hunker mortgaged to 'the interests' and deaf to the agonies of the consumer.

Insurgent, (n.): A politician who howls at the Payne-Aldrich tariff, bellows for revision of it and reduction of the cost of living, and votes against the reduction of the same; a standpatter on protection for his own State or district: a Republican tariff revisionist who insurges against reciprocity; rhetorically and derivatively a tool of the protected interests of his State or district, a flapdoodler, humbug."

It will be seen that the foregoing definition of "Insurgent" is broad enough to include the California variety.

A Fair Site Suggested

To the Owner, Editor and Staff of "Town Talk,"

Greetings: The undersigned, after a very careful analysis of the subject and a personal inspection of all possible sites for the Panama-Pacific International Exposition or World's Fair, does hereby, in behalf of the citizens and residents of the City and County of San Francisco, the State of California, and the visitors from all over the world, call attention to the Plateau in the northwest section of the city, which affords and commands one of the most magnificent and unobstructed views of natural beauty, north, south, east and west, possible for mortal eyes to behold, embracing, by special dispensation of a divine providence, the resurrection and uplifting from our ashes, the dawn of a new era, the glories of the morning rising, midday, zenith and gorgeous evening setting of the sun, the soul inspiring sight of the broad bosom of the mighty Pacific Ocean, the Farallone Islands, Point Reyes, Land's End, Mile and Diablo Cross Rocks, Baker's Beach, Fort Point, Lime Point, Point Bonita, the light houses, our beloved Golden Gate outlined with white waves, all vessels arriving and departing with their canvasses and smoke offset with the clouds beyond, naval reviews and displays, Mount Tamalpais, the bristling battlements, guns and grounds of Fortresses Miley, Barry, Baker and the Presidio, with their target practices by day and drills with powerful searchlights through the shades canopied with the moon and stars in the heavens above at night, the busy bay of San Francisco, the islands of Yerba Buena, Alcatraz and Angel, the villages and cities of Sausalito, Tiburon, Berkeley, Oakland, Alameda and Fruitvale, Mount Diablo, the Coast Range and Santa Cruz Mountains, Sutro Heights and baths, the Cliff House, Seal Rocks, Ocean Boulevard, Chateau and resorts, Mussel Rock, Golden Gate Park, Spreckels and the Chain of Lakes, Strawberry Hill, Lake Merced, Twin Peaks, Lone Mountain, Buena Vista Park, the Statue of Liberty, Sutro Forest, Parnassus, Ashbury, Clarendon, Bernal, Presidio and Pacific Heights, Rincon, Russian and Telegraph Hills, Harbor, Marine and Bay Views and all over what is destined by our united mental, physical and financial efforts and sacrifices to be the imperial city of, not only the Golden West, but, the whole earth, and, herewith suggests and submits the outline of plan that the United States Military Reservation, known as Fort Miley (for governmental, army and naval receptions and exhibition purposes) and Lincoln Park (for the administration and other principal and permanent buildings, etc.), be used as the nucleus therefor and the apex thereto, which with Sutro Heights and baths and all land west of Thirty-third avenue and north of Fulton street to the water's edge will furnish all needed space for the buildings, etc., and, in case of necessity allow the additional strip east t oTwentieth avenue, from B. to Fulton streets, or Baker's Beach to be included, and in conjunction therewith present and afford the Golden Gate Park as "our parlor" and play grounds and its use exclusively for sports and pleasures, the ocean Boulevard (broadened with a concrete wall from the Cliff House to the Chateau or the Point, with cement broadwalks, settees and adorned with statues, etc.), for promenades, the Ocean Beach for the children to "wade," "paddle," "puddle" and make "mud-pies," and with the bluffs to fish from, picnic, dream, "spoon," walk, ramble and drive upon and around, will give us the most practical, accessible, economical, ideal and best site upon which to erect the new monument in the record of time and blaze and blazon forth the new path for the generations to come hereafter, and, in that behalf, sincerely requests your personal inspection, good offices and assistance of self and friends in the "People's Big Fight" to have the same selected "for the site on the heights" and to make what will be noted as "The Greatest Fair in the History of the Whole World." Very truly yours,

—R. S. Ammen.

XI—ELBERT HUBBARD

By Edward F. O'Day

A bowl of white hyacinths was placed on a table near the footlights and the Orpheum stage was set for the Fra. They are emblematic of modest loveliness, are white hyacinths and it was noticeable that the Fra wore one in the lapel of his long frock coat. Modest and lovely himself, it was very appropriate that he should be thus adorned in hyacinthine purity and as he minced from the wings and sidled to the spotlight the Philistines greeted him approvingly. He beamed like East Aurora and smiled a roycrofty smile of pure happiness. And shaking his flowing Dutch cut locks he told a story about an earl.

"And the earl said to me, 'Very droll, old chap, y'know, but wot's a 'obo?'"

Whereat the Philistines laughed a superior sort of laugh, as well they might, at the earl who dropped his aitches. The Fra laughed too, for he was pleased with the audience almost as much as with his hyacinthine self.

When he had finished his heart to heart talk with the Philistines I met him behind the scenes. He carried the bowl of hyacinths in one hand and a glass of water in the other—modest loveliness balanced by temperance—and we made a little journey to his dressing room.

"Once I wrote a book on hyacinths," he said dreamily as he opened the faucet over them, "and I carry these as a reminder of it."

His voice was soft, caressing; and he glowed benignantly, as one should who imparts great happiness. Unconsciously I subdued my rude utterance and glowed back at him. The hyacinths in their bath I regarded with a gaze that was almost reverential. Happy flowers of modest loveliness, to remind the Fra of his book.

The conversation took a pale hyacinthine hue.

"Perhaps I might say that I would rather lecture than appear in vaudeville. Lecturing is easier, but then, I do not seek easy things. None of us should seek the easy things."

Daintily the Fra plucked the hyacinth from the lapel of his frock, gratefully he inhaled its sweetness, gracefully he unfrocked himself.

"In lecturing the people come to see you. It is very pleasant. In vaudeville—Let us express it this way: On the lecture platform you say, 'Here I am;' in vaudeville the audience says, 'Here we are.' In vaudeville they are all from Joplin."

The Fra chuckled melodiously.

"They are all from Joplin. Does that get over?"

It does.

"They are all human beings out there."

The Fra glided out of his gaiters and waved one Congress prettily at an imaginary audience.

"They are very human. Ignorant average men, just like me. I am the average man."

The Fra paused, half way out of his waistcoat, radiated modest hyacinthine loveliness, and then flowed softly on:

"I am the average man focused, concentrated."

In his suspenders he made an inspiring spectacle, a superior being humbling himself to our average humanity and—who knows?—letting slip the secret of his success.

"As a boy I went from the farm to a country newspaper office. I was devil, writer, compositor. Yes, compositor. You know the old meaning of the word? I was a compositor in the old meaning of the word. A compositor, a composer. I stood at the case and composed, like Erasmus. Erasmus was the greatest compositor in the world."

He plucked the black Windsor from his neck and his beautiful thoughts dwelt upon Erasmus. The modest lovely comparison made him very happy and he redoubled his beams as he freed himself gently from collar and shirt.

"I had no education, no school till I was thirty-six. Then I went to Harvard for two years. But I had ideas. I manufactured soap."

He beamed at the wash stand.

"I discovered a new process for manufacturing soap."

There was a scented lather in his tone as he pronounced that saponaceous word. He passel one hand rubbingly over the other.

"They paid me a hundred thousand dollars for that idea and they made millions out of my soap." There was no regret in his voice. He gave the soap willingly, as he gives lectures and heart-to-heart talks and culture and having given it for a hundred thousand to the men who made millions out of it, he waved it away and sat down to pull off his trousers.

"I lost that hundred thousand dollars and started the Philistine without money. For the last ten years I have made fifty thousand dollars a year."

He spoke apologetically like one who deprecates such sordidly lucrative literature. I almost yielded to a feeling of sorrow for the unfortunate doomed to so much money, but his purring voice took on a more joyful intonation as he slid into another pair of trousers and continued:

"But I never have any money. I am always investing, broadening my scope. Do you know, I have put in the first application for space at your fair. I shall bring half of my shop here and teach bookmaking. For I am a teacher. I believe in the new education of head, hand and heart."

His benignant gaze held me to that aspirate alliteration. His raised hand seemed to call aitches from the air, aitches which an earl would drop.

"Head, hand and heart," he repeated. "There's a good line for you."

I accepted it gratefully and stored it away with the hyacinths.

"Every school," he rippled, "should be a factory and every factory a school. I study to combine economics with education. If you are a college man you will get the thought. Are you a college man?"

My collegiate experience seemed very mean in the presence of so great a thought, but I grappled it and looked the Fra boldly in the eye, pretending intelligence. He sighed soothingly, as who should say, 'Persevere and you will some day think such thoughts for your very self.' I drooped beneath the crushing sweetness of his condescension. I felt like a hyacinth minus the loveliness.

"Economics is a great thing," he confided as he buttoned his manly bosom into a dark brown shirt. "And advertising is a great thing. Advertisements, if well written, are literature and all literature is advertising."

There was a lull while I assimilated this truth and while the Fra selected another black Windsor tie. He beamed on the tie and on me. Positively his eyes are full of beams.

"I have been an ad writer," he confessed. "If we would sell our products we must advertise. I sell ideas—and other things. I am very jealous of ideas. I am always laying for them. I am an economist of ideas. I put salt on the tail of ideas."

It suggested a sweet picture—the Fra salting ideas, as one salts a hole in the ground or as another salts a mackerel. But it implied that his ideas were not fresh ideas.

"It is not originality that counts," he explained; "it's personality. Everything has been said. Only the form changes. Life is a kaleidoscope of endless combinations."

A note was brought to him and he paused to read it. Was it one of the flock communing with the shepherd? Some creature of modest loveliness begging for a hyacinthine lock? But my awed musing was interrupted. The Fra spake again:

"Life is a balance. We must play off one set of emotions against another. I strive to do so. I try to lead a happy, healthy, busy life. That is the great thing—to be busy. Is it not? For the rest, I am afraid of no man and I want no man to be afraid of me."

It was an inspiring moment. He looked very very gentle. Whatever fear I entertained of him was lulled to peaceful security. I had his word for it that he was not dangerous. He crowned his flowing locks with a broad-brimmed hat.

"I am going to meet Major Rowan," he explained. "Major Rowan carried the message to Garcia. We are to be photographed together. But first let me see if I have not something for you."

I was on tiptoe with expectation. A hyacinth mayhap? or a lock? or one of his Windsor ties?

He burrowed gracefully in his trunk, emerging with an East Aurora borealis of radiance and a copy of "The Fra." Then from a stack on his dressing table he dealt me an engraving of his very self. I was overpowered. "The Fra" from the Fra and with the Fra's picture. It was almost too much. Was I worthy of such a gift? It made me feel very sheepish, like one of the flock in fact, so I baa'd my thanks to the Shepherd and skipped the cote.

Siftings from Many Sources

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over

By Robert McTavish

He's Becoming Famous

Our sheriff-senator Tom Finn is receiving notice in faraway New York, which is more than can be said for most of the "statesmen" at Sacramento. This is the way the New York Times introduces Tom to the eager people of the eastern seaboard:

We suppose State Senator Finn of San Francisco has acquired some provincial popularity for introducing bills that aim not only at providing separate schools for children of Mongolian, Japanese, Hindu, and Chinese descent, but requiring that property-holding aliens shall dispose of their lands within five years or forfeit them to the State. Also, Mr. Finn would have in every district of California a pale, into which all "undesirables" shall be driven; his intent, especially, being to establish a pale for the Japanese of San Francisco. If the State of Calitornia were not part of the United States and protected by the Federal Government, we wonder how long State Senator Finn's popularity would last.

A Nonsense Rhyme

Mr. Sandys Mason is an Englishman who has the courage to tempt comparisons with Lewis Carroll and Edward Lear by writing nonsense verses. In England his lucubrations are highly regarded. As a specimen of what the British like in this line the following may be interesting:

A Miscellaneous Sonnet

Buns flirt not with the callow macaroon;
And crumpets inattentive to tea-bells
Are prudent with expansive caramels;
Stays that reveal a Diva in a swoon
Fit tight, not flappy; gees tho' sorely blown
Shy at the mildest freak in curricles,
And further than the flow'r the box-room smells.
In fact the system—not to be jejune—
Itself no system has, no density,
No underwoods where (ghastliest compound!
Sunbonnets urge the Pant to trot around
Ices or milk-rolls with clubs or chivalry.
Nathless, a man of strict sobriety
Could tie a shoe-lace in that Underground.

A Pessimistic Prophecy

The Boston Transcript, the most coldly intellectual of all the "high brow" newspapers of the East, has uttered a jeremiad concerning our great fair. Thus does the Transcript's editorial seer prophesy:

Unthinking San Franciscans, little reck ye what is coming on the wings of time! Vainglorious now over the winning of the great Canal Fair for 1915, ye dream of civic blossoming such as no American city has yet put forth. Think not to have the garden without the weeds. The weeds have not forgotten. They are coming. Already every faker and "streetman" in the country has put down, "San Francisco, 1915," in his dingy engagement book. Swindlers and confidence men are taking notice, and so, too, are those feminine sneak-thieves who find their golden opportunity when housewives are offering rooms to out-of-town guests. Already such are chuckling to think how much small property they can make off with while the mistress of the house is crying up her rooms. O ye San Franciscans, the cot-bed is coming! The rooming-sign is coming! Like an eruption upon the face of your streets shall break out the rash of cheap signs. Decent, respectable old family homes shall sport labels, "The Bridal," "Exposition View," "The Ballyhoo." The rooming-house solicitor is coming too. You shall not hear the sound of incoming trains for the noise of his insistent, never-ceasing clack. And there shall be feuds between housewives, the friends of a lifetime quarrelling over who shall snatch the most roomers. The souvenir is coming; and the stands of them that sell souvenirs shall invade your principal streets that they look unutterably cheap. And if your laws will not allow stands on the sidewalks, then breaches will be made in the walls of your business buildings and souvenir-stands let in. But the stands will come. And pink lemonade will be sold upon your boulevards and also peanuts-pop-corn-and-corn-fritters-a-meal-in-every-package-a-nickel-a-half-a-dime. And there shall be shows. Penny-vaudeville shall be choice compared to those shows—Paris by Gaslight, Dante's Inferno, Cripple Creek Gambling Den and things like that. These shall break out on your main thoroughfares and keep just out of reach of the police. And out near the exposition grounds all the unsavory shows which fail to get into the true and holy Midway, they shall camp round about the walls. And there shall be murders and riots among the dubious showfolk, and the odium thereof shall attach to the true and holy Midway within the walls. And there shall be quick-lunch kiosks and Bohemian beer gardens, and night lunch wagons prowling by day. And there shall be ten-cent soda and all prices according. And every man's maid-servant shall threaten to go away and get a job at the Fair. And there shall be exposition slang. And every true San Franciscan shall be bled for stock and gate tickets and second mortgage bonds and then more gate tickets and the deficit. And there will be guests. The son of your great-uncle's step-brother from Jamaica will come to visit you, and the grand-niece of your brother-in-law's most cordially detested aunt.

Why a Clergyman Gave Up

A minister near Stockton has given up the religious career in despair of ever finding in it the ordinary human comforts to which all men are considered entitled. In a letter published in the Stockton Mail he says that he does not receive enough compensation to enable him to support his family and he gives other reasons for his surrender, as follows:

Other things have contributed to my decision. In these years I have found not a few earnest, unselfish, consecrated Christians. I do not believe that I am specially morbid or unfair in my estimate. But through all these years a conviction has been growing within me that the average church member cares precious little about the kingdom of God and its advancement, or the welfare of his fellow men. He is a Christian in order that he may save his soul from Hell, and for no other reason. He does as little as he can, lives as indifferently as he dares. If he thought he could gain Heaven without even lifting his finger for others he would jump at the chance. Never have I known more than a small minority of any church which I have served to be really interested in and unselfishly devoted to God's work. I am tired; tired of being the only one in the church from whom real sacrifice is expected; tired of straining and tugging to get Christian people to live like Christians; tired of planning work for my people and then being compelled to do it myself or see it left undone; tired of dodging my creditors when I would not need to if I had what was due me; tired of the affrighted vision of penniless old age.

Is New York a Jay Town?

After all there seems to be proof that New York is a jay town—one of the most prominent jay towns on the map. A group of Canadian mine operators were arguing the question at a Sunday morning breakfast in the cafe of the Waldorf-Astoria. One of them was so impressed by the visual show of elegance in all the appointments of the place—the mahogany, the silverware, the polite service—that he could not believe the statement of his companions that New York is really and truly a jay town. "Here," said the leader of the affirmative vote, "take this bar of gold and try to pay our check with it. This slug of genuine metal is worth $1,900. Now just you offer it to the cashier in settlement of the bill and tell him he can keep the change." The check came to $14. The man who had the negative end of the debate accepted the commission as a test. He was a Westerner, honest-looking, simply dressed and of straight-forward manner. He approached the cashier with an offer to settle the check for this bar of gold, saying that he had no ready money. The cashier looked at the ore, which was so soft it could be dented by the simple test of throwing it in the cash register, handed it back to the mining man and declared it was not worth 15 cents. The hotel detective was called. The man from the West had resumed his place at the table and his friends were laughing at him. The hotel detective was shocked to hear that any one was trying to sell a gold brick in the Waldorf-Astoria. But when he hurried over to the table occupied by the mining operators he recognized them as frequent guests of the hotel, and realized the joke that had been played.

Our Art Acquisitions

Notwithstanding the best efforts of foreign governments American millionaires keep on buying the masterpieces of the old masters and transporting them across the Atlantic. The temptation of fabulous prices is too strong for the impecunious families of France, Italy, Spain and England to resist and the great pictures of Velasquez, Rembrandt, Murillo and others are passing one after another into American ownership. J. Pierpont Morgan who may or may not be a connoisseur but who certainly is an indefatigable buyer has just imported the great portrait of Philip IV by Velasquez. It is said that he paid $400,000 for it and the claim is being made that this is the record price for a painting. This however is an error. Mrs. Collis P. Huntington paid the same price for Velasquez' Duke of Olivares. So frequent are the reports of these great artistic purchases that even the London Times has taken alarm and is thundering about the raid on the European art galleries.

S. Q. P.

By Fritz Reutter (From the German)

About ten minutes before two o'clock the boys sauntered down the sleepy main street of the little town in the direction of the polytechnic school. There was only a year's difference in age; both wore caps and carried their school books. There the likeness between them ceased.

Hans was the younger and was in many ways, superior to the other. His figure was slenderer and more sinewy, but otherwise he was his friend's most humble and obedient servant.

Sanders, the elder of the two, carried in his school-bag a sort of juggler's device which not one of his schoolmates had ever been able to ferret out, also a lead-pencil box of seven different colors, and a piece of red chalk. He had read "Sherlock Holmes" many times from A to Z and had even seen it on the stage. In consequence he loved mysterious exploits and startling, explosive effects. He was always ready to perform inexplicable feats, because it gave him pleasure to hear other people say that they did not know how to explain the matter. He possessed the power of imagination, and imagination can make either a coward or a poet of a boy, a liar or a general.

Sanders knit his brow as they walked down the street. He was lost in deep thought.

Hans repeated the while over and over again the words which in the next quarter of an hour he must learn at all hazards: "Two triangles are similar, if two sides in one are proportional to two sides in the other and if the angles contained by these sides are equal."

He was just about to begin again when Sanders gave him a poke in the ribs and said with great earnestness:

"S. Q. P.!"

It was the stipulated signal full of awful significance. "S. Q. P." meant "Sauve qui qeut." As soon as he heard these words he must run as fast as his legs would carry him to the hollow oak that stood near the playground outside the city, without hesitation and without question, at any hour of the day from whatever place he might happen to be. Otherwise he was in danger of losing the friendship and guidance of Sanders and of never again being initiated into the many mysteries in which Sanders was enveloped.

Today, as always, Hans thrust to one side all further thought of geometry and afternoon school. The mystical call had sounded and he had but to obey. He started forth as quickly as he could run, and Sanders, who was somewhat fatter and clumsier, had great trouble in keeping up with him.

"Halt!" cried Sanders suddenly. Hans obediently stopped still. It never occurred to him that Sanders had perhaps called a halt because he was out of breath and could run no longer.

"In there!" commanded Sanders. "Lie down on your stomach and do not move."

The hiding-place happened to be behind the open door of a large coal-yard. Joy beamed from the eyes of the younger boy. The excitement pleased him. The question why he had not attended school that afternoon would probably arise later, but for the moment the thought was sufficient that every hour has its own calamity.

They remained hidden there for three full minutes without uttering a word. Suddenly Sanders sprang up. "Come!" said he. "The danger is no longer at hand. I had luck today to find this hiding-place at just the right moment."

"Why?" asked Hans.

"Someone was just coming down the street, whose path we do not dare to cross. But now all is well again. We have not been observed!" Hans was proud in the consciousness of not having been observed. The thrill of the adventure was beginning. He dared a second question, this time concerning the excuse they would have to invent to explain their absence from school.

"I cannot be worried with such things now," replied Sanders, contemptuously wrinkling his nose. "I did not give you the signal without the most urgent reason. We can go a little more slowly now, if you wish it. The land is safe for the present. Perhaps later we shall have to do some more running."

The playground seemed entirely forsaken and deserted. Only a few nursery-maids sat with their charges on a bench. The two adventurers stood still under a certain tree. They took off their school-bags. In obedience to the command of his friend, Hans climbed up the tree and hid them in its hollow trunk. Also, he obeyed the command to follow the example of his leader and to wear his cap turned inside out.

"What shall we do now?" asked Hans.

Sanders had merely followed an impulse of the moment when he had given the signal. He had not thought out any further plans. "Do you think," said he mysteriously, "that you could play detective for a while? Follow someone without being seen?"

Hans replied modestly that he would like to try.

"Very well," spoke Sanders. "Hide, then, in that bush over yonder. When you hear me whistle you will step forth and follow the person pointed out to you by me. I shall merely point with my finger, for such things must be done by means of signs and not through words. Afterwards you must come back here to report to me."

Hans obediently hid himself. Sanders looked up and down the street. He was looking for an interesting object for his detective. At last it appeared in the form of a pretty, graceful girl of about twenty. Sanders whistled shortly but loudly.

In the twinkling of an eye Hans had slipped out from the bush and was following the girl. His effort not to be discovered was so dramatic and so complicated that it attracted the attention of the nursery-maids in the vicinity. One of them thought he was a little bit crazy because he wore his cap turned inside out. Another thought he was playing wild Indian or negro. Fortunately Hans did not hear these humiliating criticisms. The younger girl passed the playground and walked on toward the town. Hans followed.

Sanders remained sitting at the foot of the hollow oak. He drew from his vest pocket the stump of a cigarette and lighted it. In the interest of public morality one of the nurses began to scold him, saying that so young a boy had no right to smoke. He told her to go to the devil and then ran, for fear she would tell on him. When he returned to his place at the foot of the oak he saw Hans also appearing in the distance. Hans was running and had something in his hand. His whole being breathed triumph and excitement.

"I have it!" said he, throwing himself down upon the grass by the side of his leader. "But how could you have known that she would let it fall?"

"What difference does that make to you?" replied Sanders bruskly. "Let me see the thing for a minute."

Without the slightest sign of surprise he took the pocketbook from his friend's hand. Evidently the fates felt graciously disposed toward him and he did not dare to let such a chance slip by. He counted the contents of the pocketbook —ninety-eight marks and twenty pfennig.

"That makes forty-nine marks and ten pfennig for each of us," said Hans, full of satisfaction.

This thought had also entered Sanders' head immediately, but, as leader, he was compelled to reject it as soon as he discovered it was not original with him.

"Do you think so?" he replied grimly. "Was it, indeed, you who knew that we would find something here this afternoon? Was it you who knew what we had to do to get the money?"

"I did not say that," returned Hans dejectedly. "Or course, you are the master here and you command in this game."

It annoyed Sanders to hear his pretty mystery called a game. Bruskly he demanded: "Tell me, rather, what further news you have discovered. Where does the girl live?"

"I don't know. As soon as she dropped the pocketbook I picked it up and ran. I thought that was what I ought to do."

"I meant what I said, and I told you to follow her. That is what you ought to have done. You have upset all of my plans. Do you see a policeman anywhere?"

Hans looked sharply in all directions. Then he threw himself full-length upon the ground and pressed his ear to the earth. Possibly an unnecessary proceeding and rather insulting to the tread of a policeman, but undoubtedly very Indian-like and Sherlock Holmesish. Hans declared that no enemy was in the neighborhood.

"So much the better for you," replied Sanders darkly. "If a policeman had caught you with this pocketbook, you would have got at least twenty-eight years in the penitentiary."

"Nonsense!" cried Hans. "Why? 'Stolen, stolen, give again; found, found, keep then'!"

"But when you yourself see the person lose his money? I believe the law in Germany is different. If you know who has lost it, you must give it back."

"Maybe so!" replied Hans almost dolefully. "Only I can't understand where you learn all these things."

"You have no time now to worry yourself about such trifles as that. There is but one thing for us to do, and we must lose no time in doing it. Have you a knife?"

"Yes," answered Hans, drawing it from his pocket.

"Don't take it out here. The sun shines on the steel and it shimmers in the far distance—and we do not know who may be upon our trail. Hide as quickly as you can in that bush over there. I shall follow."

Under the sure cover of the thick hazel-nut shrubbery Hans drew the knife a second time from his pocket. Sanders cut a piece of turf and, lifting it up, laid the pocketbook beneath. He then put the turf again in its place and strewed sand over it to conceal all traces of their work. Han's heart grew lighter; the affair was beginning to be interesting once more. Sanders consulted the compass on his watch-chain.

The Spectator

Financiers at War

Of Mr. H. P. Wilson regarding whose antecedents I expressed some curiosity two weeks ago we are destined to learn much in the near future. Incidentally we shall learn something of Mr. Frank L. Brown, the financier, who has been cutting something of a swath in financial circles, and who, though comparatively a stranger in our midst, has played no inconspicuous part in the making of current history. Mr. Brown has the faculty of "getting in right" on short notice. Versed in the mysteries of finance, possessed of an instinct for the imponderabilities, as they are called, of big business, he came among us with ideas that seemed worthy of capitalization and he quickly formed some advantageous connections. Already he is one of our leading citizens. He was one of the most active members of that energetic body of men that took hold of the Fair project and carried it through, and last week in the parade he was doffing his hat to the groundlings all along the line of march as though he were the Caesar of the occasion just back from Gaul with the glory of the conquest shining in his amiable countenance. Unquestionably a man of parts is Mr. Brown. And now that I hear that Mr. H. P. Wilson has declared war to the knife against Mr. Brown I look for some sensational developments.

Earl's Eulogy of Wilson

Mr. Wilson is himself an expert financier, and from all accounts a fighter worthy of any man's steel. According to his friends he supplied the motive power for Brown when Brown was coming to the front with a rush. One of Wilson's most enthusiastic sponsors is Guy C. Earl. At a banquet given in this city a few weeks ago to the heads of the departments of the Great Western Power Company Mr. Earl contributed a glowing eulogy of Mr. Wilson. He pronounced Mr Wilson the creator of the Great Western Power Company. "He took hold of this project in its crude state in 1904," said Earl, "and if he had not been a man of great faith and vision he would have done as others had done, that is to say, he would have said the project was too large to be undertaken. But he took hold, mastered its details, and then began a campaign in Wall street for the financing of the proposition. In the midst of his labors the great disaster befell San Francisco, but undaunted by this and by other untoward events, he went steadily forward and succeeded in bringing ten million dollars of Eastern money to California with the promise of many times that amount in the future. Nor did his services cease when the project was financed. He has been its main engine power, the dynamo. Indeed he has been the water and the power house that have supplied most of the energy, and he is responsible more than any other man for the development of the company to the present hour. He is one of the few men living today that have seen the possibilities and meaning for the people, of California, that strip of land lying between a thousand miles of semi-desert and thousands of miles of ocean. He foresaw the great part this land is to take in the world's affairs. To his clear vision this State seems the nation's facade through which it looks out on the great arena of waters, and faces its duty for the ages." From all of which it appears that Mr. H. P. Wilson is a man of imagination, a genuine Captain of Industry with the courage of his convictions and the power to win the confidence of the empire builders of Wall street.

A Charge of Fraud

And this Mr. Wilson has draped his banners on the outward wall needing no spur to prick the sides of his intent. It's war to the knife and the knife to the hilt. In a complaint filed in the Superior Court by his attorneys, Cooper, Gray & Cooper and Samuel M. Shortridge, Wilson charges Frank L. Brown with having played him false, and I am told that he intends not only to make the defendant disgorge but also to repent. I am also told that on the trial of this suit the whole interesting story of the relations that have existed between Wilson and Brown will be told. It will be told not only by word of mouth but by many letters of a most intimate character and not altogether dealing with purely commercial matters. There will be some sidelights on domestic affairs thrown on for the purpose of showing that Brown was under a great load of gratitude to Wilson, that Wilson in the role of benefactor had saved him from financial ruin and business disrepute, and had been led to believe that the man whom he had befriended was so deeply grateful that he could be trusted in all things. The object of this suit is to recover certain money that was earned by the firm of Wilson & Brown out of which the plaintiff claims to have been defrauded by his partner. This firm was engaged in buying and selling stocks and bonds; and among other deals that they handled was one by which Wilson obtained a purchaser for all the stock of the Portland Consolidated Railways Company at $150 a share. Brown devoted himself to the business of buying the stock for the firm at the lowest possible price. Now the plaintiff relates that of the stock purchased by Brown were four hundred shares which he obtained from William H. Crocker at $80 a share and upon which he made a profit of $280,000 of which he rendered no accounting. This is a pretty serious charge to be made against a man of affairs. It's the charge which Wilson has made against Brown, and the investigation of it will occupy the attention of one of our courts.

Last Saturday's Celebration

It must be confessed that the celebration of the fair victory last Saturday was not a success. The masses were only partially enthused and the classes went through the motions of an ecstasy which they did not feel. It was a holiday of artificially stimuluated gaiety. Bombs boomed, sirens shrilled, flags blew in the breeze, red fire burned and the bands played, but the carnival spirit was aweary and could not stimulate itself to any very vigorous exhibitions of hilarity. The parade in the afternoon was voted a good parade by those who took the trouble to inspect it. The speeches in Union Square were dutifully heard and methodically applauded. In the evening King Carnival received but indifferent homage. There was the inevitable confetti, the customary serpentine, here and there the toot of a lonely horn. Positively it was a frosty festivity. Great preparations had been made by the Palace and St. Francis hotels and by the cafes, but they might have spared themselves a great deal of trouble, for the crowds were by no means difficult to handle. Everybody kept his enthusiasm within bounds with seeming ease. The largest crowd gathered early in the evening at the Palace where the heroes of the congressional battle were on exhibition. The event of the exhibition was a hand-shaking function, the groundlings being permitted to pass in single file before the conquerors and clutch their palms for a brief instant. Judging from their looks the heroes enjoyed this ordeal more than the groundlings. Following that ceremony the mayor called for three cheers for San Francisco which were accordingly given. The city actually needed cheering for it was in a melancholy mood.

What Was the Reason?

The reason was not far to seek. The city has been surfeited with celebrations and longs for a spell of the simple life. The approach of Lenten calm never appealed to San Francisco more than it did this year. The hectic flush of carnival has been so much in our cheeks that we want repose. We have won a great victory and are mighty glad of it. But we don't see the necessity of everlastingly celebrating. Nobody needs to stimulate our enthusiasm; it is much more important to stimulate the enthusiasm of the rest of the world which must co-operate with us if our exposition is to be successful. Besides, all this celebrating is bad for business. The past month has not been a very good one for our merchants, big and little. It was a short month to begin with and it contained seven holidays—four Sundays, Lincoln Day, Washington's Birthday and Exposition Day. That left just twenty-one days for the transaction of business, three weeks out of a month. When the order went forth—it was practically an order—that all shops should close on Saturday from one to five in honor of the celebration, the merchants groaned but did not dare protest. Many of them depend on the Saturday afternoon trade to pull them through the week with a profit and here they were deprived of the opportunity to do four hours' business. Is it any wonder that their mirth was forced? that they went home and to bed instead of speeding the hours with hilarity? Pretty soon the fair directors will call for part of the money that was subscribed last year. They should give the retailers every opportunity to fatten their bank accounts, so that the subscriptions may be made good without delay. Don't think that I am scolding—I am only pointing out the uselessness of holding any more celebrations for some time to come.

Poet—It's three years now since I sent you my poems, and they aren't yet in print.

Editor—My dear sir, have patience. Homer waited three thousand years before his "Iliad" was printed.

The Last Chapter

Speaking of the decision by which Abe Ruef goes to his deserts Attorney-General Webb says, "I am very much gratified at the result, and I regard it as a distinct victory for justice"; also, "Justice has been delayed in this case, but justice will be done." If Attorney-General Webb believes what he says he is a very obtuse individual. But according to Justice Shaw of the Supreme Court Attorney-General Webb does not always believe what he says. Indeed we have it on the dictum of Justice Shaw, uttered in open court in the very teeth of Attorney-General Webb, that this distinguished functionary who is employed by the people to assist in the administration of justice, when striving to send a man to jail sometimes says what is not true and sometimes says what he does not believe. And this dictum Attorney-General Webb did not take the trouble to deny on the occasion on which it became a matter of public record. So it is quite possible that Attorney-General Webb's sentiment with regard to justice being done may not justly be ascribed to obtuseness. Of course justice has not been done in the Ruef case. A majority of the justices of the Supreme Court after reading Ruef's petition for a rehearing expressed the opinion that justice might be denied Ruef unless his petition were granted. To do him justice they agreed to grant his petition, and then, before their decision was recorded one of them left the State temporarily. Technically the decision was made the day it was recorded or else it was not made at all. Technically it could not have been made the day it was recorded because on that day, the day on which the statutory time for granting the rehearing expired, one of the men who concurred in the decision being out of the State could not participate in the decision. So while it has been found that Ruef was entitled to a rehearing, a rehearing he cannot have because the Attorney-General of the State took advantage of a technicality, the same kind of technicality precisely that a debtor takes advantage of when he pleads the Statute of Limitations. So the case stands thus: admittedly there is merit in Ruef's petition for a rehearing, but the rehearing he is denied not because of any technical omission or commission on his part but because of a technical irregularity on the part of the court. Suppose the shoe were on the other foot. Suppose the Court of Appeal had granted Ruef a new trial and the prosecution petitioned for a rehearing and the same thing happened as has happened. What then? Would Attorney-General Webb have said that justice was done by the vacating of the order by which the People were granted a rehearing? Or would he have shrieked for the recall? Well Ruef, as I have said, is going to his deserts. I am quite sure that he is going to his deserts, and I also am quite sure that all the crimes he committed constitute but a venial transgression when compared with those of the men who have prostituted justice to the end that he might be punished. I am also quite sure that as time runs on far greater infamy will attach to their memory than to the memory of the infamous Ruef.

He Is the Rebellious Wife

The female impersonator in literature is not a novelty, but it is always interesting to find him in our midst. Having just discovered him in Mr. John D. Barry, a gentleman who lucubrates diurnally on the editorial page of the Bulletin, I hasten to pay him my devoirs. Mr. Barry, I have reason to believe, is the author of "The Confession of a Rebellious Wife." This book was published anonymously, but a stylist like Mr. Barry cannot conceal his handiwork and the secret has leaked out. Not that "The Confession" is embalmed in the same style which Mr. Barry wreathes around his journalistic causeries. As the Rebellious Wife might say, Oh mercy, nothing of the sort! Mr. Barry has two styles, a masculine style and a feminine style. His masculine style, I may as well explain for the benefit of those who cannot differentiate, is lavished all over his contributions to the Bulletin; his feminine style is reserved for his appearance in the role of a literary female impersonator. So far as I know Mr. Barry has appeared only once in this role. If he repeats the performance and the secret comes to my ears I shall gladly inform my readers. The vagaries of litterateurs are my hobby and the epicene Mr. Barry is undoubtedly a litterateur. He acknowledges every day in his editorial coign the authorship of many books, none of which I have ever read or seen.

His Unappreciative Husband

"The Confession of a Rebellious Wife" is not, as some might infer, a chronicle of feminine lapses. Mr. Barry, in the character of the wife, is rebellious in a perfectly ladylike way. Not once does he, so to speak, slap the ten commandments on the wrist. He simply gives us the heart throbs of a woman with an unappreciative husband. Mr. Barry's heart seems to throb in perfect unison with the wife's. As Mr. Barry's narrative is given in the first person it actually seems that the wife's throbs are his very own. The sex illusion is so well sustained that one finds one-self speaking of Mr. Barry as the wife and of the unappreciative husband as Mr. Barry's husband. This is somewhat embarrassing as it carries the suggestion of Mr. Barry in the role of Tiresias or of that pretty son of Hermes and Aphrodite whom the nymph Salmacis loved with such startling results. Thus does Mr. Barry pay the penalty of his literary skill. At times George Eliot has been mistaken for a man; Mr. Barry is in danger of being thought a woman.

Mr. Barry on Love

Frank is the unappreciative husband of the rebellious wife. Mr. Barry tells us that at first Frank was an ideal lover. "He showed that he was determined to marry me. Then I grew frightened. For several weeks I did not know what to do. To a girl there is something terrible in the approach of love. It seems opposed to all the reserve bred into her from birth." It is good to learn this from one who knows the feminine mind as Mr. Barry seems to know it. He goes on to explain a curious situation. Frank, it seems, assumed an almost feminine role in the courtship. "He acted as if it were only right and natural that I should be the leader." That this seemed "natural" to the woman also Mr. Barry leads us to believe. "In the love of nearly every woman for a man there goes the feeling of indulgence and solicitude. . . . It has enabled many a weak man to win a strong woman." Then comes the marriage. "During our honeymoon, a time of bliss such as I had never imagined, we used to become at times dreadfully nervous in each others' presence. Often Frank would go away from me and let me recover myself." Frank becomes absorbed in business and the wife begins to grow dissatisfied. Being an ordinary sort of husband he takes his domestic bliss as a matter of course, while his wife broods about it and wonders if it will last. The inevitable happens. It doesn't last—for her. "Frank was ceasing to be dependent on me." That was a tragic discovery. "I actually envied women who were married to failures, to men who had to lean on them and be sustained by them." When a child was born Frank very naturally gave himself "airs." "He became a man in his own house," which threw his wife into "uncontrollable irritation." But she prides herself on her fidelity to Frank. "And yet I believe I could easily love another man. I could even love two men at the same time, one of them being Frank." But she says she is not wicked. "I am hedged about, protected. . . . No man from outside can even come near me." Oh virtuous wife!

His Horror of the Stork

Mr. Barry, in the character of the rebellious wife, is happy in the coming of one child, but wants no more, although Frank does. "It apparently never entered his mind that to me those children would mean paying a terrible price! . . . I refuse a second time to make such a sacrifice for the race. I made it once because I knew no better." Frank is no longer "in love" with her, although he still "loves" her, a pretty distinction. "Though romantic love may disappear from the hearts of men the sex attraction remains. But without tenderness the manifestation of this attraction becomes horrible to women, repulsive." This is one of "the horrors of modern marriage." "Men believe that it results from the squeamish nature of women and from the higher education." She thinks of divorce, but "divorce is no solution while men and conditions remain what they are." She centers her affections on her son, but she is greatly worried about him and his future. "There is the terrible problem of the outbreak of sex in a boy. How am I to deal with that?" Mr. Barry, it will be noted, is obsessed with this idea of sex; in the character of the wife he is morbid, shall I say abnormal? But finally the rebel thinks out a characteristic revenge for herself. Frank has been very successful in business, he has given her an envied position in the world. But he is no longer "in love" with her and that cannot be forgiven. She will retaliate on him through her son. She will train her boy to "take what I call a human attitude toward things and people." What does this mean? Simply that she will do "everything in my power to unfit him for business." Oh sweet rebellious wife! Oh happy husband! Oh poor son! Oh Barry! Which is as much as to say, Oh fudge!

A Notable Reconciliation

As well as its revenges the whirligig of Time brings in its reconciliations, as, for example, the reconciliation between Governor Hiram W. Johnson and Mr. Truxtun Beale. Once upon a time, not very long ago, Governor Johnson was attorney for the plaintiff in the case of Marriott vs. Beale. This was a suit for damages for personal injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff. A jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed the case and Hiram Johnson filed a brief in behalf of his client from the last page of which comes this excerpt:

"With indignation, horror, contempt and scorn we recall the facts of this assault; the striking with a revolver of an unarmed man in his home, after beguiling him with a lying, telephonic message; striking him, too, when his back was turned, laying open his head, almost blinding his eye, and breaking his hand; the flight in his own home to his own bed chamber; the frightened wife upon the stairway past whom a bully's bullets fly, and upon whom is scattered the blood of her wounded husband; her anguished cry, "shoot me" as her husband falls and crawls to their chamber; the loud reports of the forty-four caliber revolver; the flight to the bedroom, where the master of the house lies prone, helpless, bleeding, clubbed from behind and shot in the back as he had fled; the locking of the doors of their bedroom; the flight then of the assassins, so that one even left his hat—when we think of all this, and the shame and wrong of it, our only wonder is that the verdict was not many times larger. That verdict certainly is not unjust to the appellant. Morally it should be upheld; legally, affirmed."

The court read Hiram's brief and sustained the verdict. Now of course Hiram believed all that he said in his brief, and whatever may have been the opinion of the court regarding Hiram's description of the assault on his client it is certain that its opinion regarding the verdict was that it was just. But that Hiram no longer believes in his brief may be inferred from the circumstance that the other day he appointed Mr. Truxtun Beale a regent of the State University, an institution which, according to the Boughten Bulletin, was invaded the other day by "Big Business" incarnated in the person of President Anderson of the Bank of California.

magazines has roused the spirit of revenge in George Sylvester Viereck, the young poet who edits the dramatic department of Current Literature. Viereck has written a poem, "The Singing Vampire," which none but a very young poet might be pardoned for writing and then not until in riper years he repented and like Swinburne made it clear that he was ashamed of the erotic effusions of his immature Muse. The first two stanzas of the poem but faintly indicate the character of the whole:

Thou art no goddess risen clean
From the infatuated brine;
Nay, rather an exotic queen,
A dark, low-templed Messaline,
Dumb till some human sacrifice
Besplit upon her monstrous shrine:
With tears and blood we paid the price
Of all those golden songs of thine.

Life of an hundred victims throbs
In thy enchantments fierce, uncouth,
And through thy rose-red passion sobs
The pallid wraith of ruined youth.
Within thy bosom's labyrinth
Has not the monster had his fill?
Why slay this stainless Hyacinth?
Are there not men to do thy will?

Editor Reedy tells us that Viereck himself is the "stainless Hyacinth," and asks, "Who is the 'low-templed Messaline' of 'the famished flanks?'" Perhaps like William Watson who did not hesitate to divulge the name of "the woman with the serpent's tongue," young Viereck will see no impropriety in whispering the name of "the singing vampire." Indeed the probability is that his friends easily recognized her when they read the poem. There are some fine gentlemen among the poets.

The Hatch Case

The case of Willard P. Hatch is of interest not on account of the strange vicissitudes of his purple career or the light that it reflects on the management of the juvenile court system but on account of the character and devotion of his sponsors and defenders. This ugly scandal of which Willard P. Hatch is the central figure affords an interesting study in psychology. Willard P. Hatch is a young man with a very much tainted past, with a fondness for lickerish themes and an intimate familiarity with the turgid trade of harlotry and life in the fens and sumps of society. Hardly a fit man, this, to have authority over wayward boys and girls. Yet he is a protege of Judge Ben. Lindsey, the vociferous reformer of Denver. But his doings in Denver were such that to display a becoming sense of communal dignity and of the proprieties Judge Lindsey was obliged to dismiss Hatch from the official position held by him in the Juvenile Court. Nevertheless he subsequently recommended the young man for a similar position in this city. Here he was vested with considerable authority which he exercised until he had the indiscretion to expose his mental bent in a book. The shock that he produced was followed by a scandal, and he resigned with many tears and with professions of repentance and the assurance that he had "seen the light" and reformed. Notwithstanding the dramatic pathos of the situation Hatch did not conquest the feelings of the authorities. The probability is that his resignation would have been promptly accepted had it not been for the mysterious influence behind him. Where the seat of this influence was located became known when Fremont Older showed his hand, Older the reformer who has himself seen the light a number of times, the red light, the blue light, the green light and the yellow light. With that same tenderness with which he once sought to rehabilitate Abe Ruef and to stir up public sympathy for the man who had accepted immunity, the perennially repentant Older appealed to the emotions of the Boughten Bulletin's readers in the interest of his young repentant and regenerate friend from Denver. And Hatch was in a fair way to be reinstated when the Call turned on a flood of light in which the darling of Cypria was exposed as a fit associate for his defender but not for children.

An All-Hearing Governor

A "statesman" of many years experience who was retired from public life by the returns of the last election came down from Sacramento the other day and declared that he could not call to mind a governor of California who had exercised such eternal vigilance over the members of the legislature as Governor Johnson. He says that even private conversations between legislators find their way to the governor's privy ear. And he gave an example. In his Lincoln Day speech the governor went out of his way to declare his approval of the bill then pending which provided for the recall of judges. Assemblyman Rosendale of Salinas heard the speech and afterwards criticized the governor's reference to the recall measure. He told one of his confreres that he considered it bad taste for the governor to inject politics into a speech on a patriotic occasion. A certain Oakland assemblyman overheard this criticism and forthwith reported it to the governor. The governor was wrathy. He summoned Rosendale and lectured him warmly for committing lese majeste. When Rosendale discovered who had carried tales to the executive office he warned his friends to be mum in the presence of the Oakland assemblyman and very mum they are when that individual is about. But the governor has other sources of information and they keep him continually supplied with the obiter dicta of the capitol.

"Tex" Rickard Off to Argentine

It will be a long time before we see "Tex" Rickard again. The smiling promoter of big fights who would have given San Francisco the Jeffries-Johnson battle if Governor Gillett had only allowed him, is seeking new fields for the investment of his surplus money and energy. He sailed recently from New York for the Argentine Republic with the intention of becoming a sheep and cattle raiser. Before leaving Rickard told the reporters that he was through with fight promoting. He feels the call of the wild; he seeks a new frontier. Down in the wonderful South American country he expects to forget all about the eccentricities of temperamental prizefighters. But if the fighting game revives, I hazard the guess that "Tex" will fling aside his shepherd's crook and take the first steamer for home. There is no antitoxin for the pugilistic bacillus.

Legs at the Mardi Gras

"Does charity cover a multitude of sins or does it uncover a multitude of shins?" mused one of the most active young men at the Mardi Gras. It was a pertinent query, for there is no gainsaying that a multitude of shins were uncovered Shrove Tuesday night. Our society women seem to be delighted when an opportunity offers to show their lower limbs. If it isn't a kirmess it's a society vaudeville and if it isn't a society vaudeville it's a mardi gras. The ladies who didn't show their legs at Pavilion Rink in the sacred cause of charity and the smiling cause of fun were negligible. They might have been counted very easily, if one cared to take that trouble. But most of those present didn't care. They were too busy studying the leg feminine of society. And yet I would not call the costumes daring in the ordinary acceptation of the adjective. They were cut low and lifted high, but they did not make one gasp as well as gaze except in a few instances. But many of them were daring in another way, a way of which I cannot speak without embarrassment. I dislike to offend the tender susceptibilities of our sensitive society women, but I must say that a lot of them are very daring in showing what the vulgar would call "their underpinning." It takes courage to exhibit a limb when that limb is not a thing of beauty and a joy forever. There was a lot of that courage shown at the Mardi Gras. Why should women have their fancy dress costumes cut to the knee when their cheval glasses must tell them that their legs are not inspiring to look upon? It is one of the mysteries of San Francisco society.

It was a Hobbled Affair

The Mardi Gras was a great success. Socially it was a greater success than the Mardi Gras of last year. More of our society people attended in masque, more stayed to the wee hour when "Home Sweet Home" was played. But in gayety, in piquancy, it was not the equal of the bal masque of a year ago. That element of our population which is temperamentally and professionally sportive was not encouraged to attend this year. Not needing a great deal of encouragement to go where there is fun to be had, it attended anyway, but in small numbers. And it was very discreet. Nearly everybody was very discreet. Discretion was rampant, so to speak, before supper. After everybody had been warmed with wine the fun went with a quickened pace, but never became uproarious. One or two too gay young men who showed symptoms of bursting the bonds were quietly yet firmly warned by members of the committee and quickly subsided. It was amusing to note their looks of abashment when the voice of authority whispered in their ears. As I foresaw, it was a hobbled affair One picked one's dancing steps, so to speak; also one picked one's partners. At least, nearly everybody did. There were a few conspicuous exceptions and the partners they picked for a whirl or so were so very fetching in costume and so very alluring in figure that we hadn't it in our hearts to blame them.

How We Do Love Dancing!

It is remarkable how little ennui there is in San Francisco society in connection with dancing. Our men and women seem never to get enough of it. Hour after hour matrons of many seasons, beaux of a thousand assemblies and belles of uncertain age footed it with unmistakable evidences of pleasure. Women like Mrs. Will and Mrs. Gus Taylor, Mrs. Fred McNear, Mrs. Walter and Mrs. Peter Martin, Mrs. Vincent Whitney, Miss Alice Hager, Mrs. Worthington Ames, Mrs. Laurance Scott and Mrs. Latham McMullin were rarely off the floor and frequently wore out two or three partners during a single dance which was less surprising than it may seem, for the dances were very long and the encores extremely generous. Most of these women stayed till the very end of the affair and not a few were genuinely disappointed when the orchestra gave the signal for the rush to the cloak rooms. The younger girls left earlier with their mammas and cast longing glances behind them as they reluctantly withdrew. Miss Johffe, the Cluffs, Miss Elyse Schultz and Miss Cecil Cowles were among the few who prevailed on their chaperons to let them stay. They were so popular that it would have been a shame to tear them away from their persistent partners.

The Prize Winners

Raphael Weill and Walter Martin seemed to be hard put to it to pick out the prizewinning costumes. The trouble was that there was not a great variety to select from. Few worked their imaginations overtime in preparing their masquerades. The women showed a partiality for Merry Widow costumes while the men confessed their laziness by contenting themselves largely with dominoes. The first prize was awarded to Mrs. Peter Martin. She appeared in Turkish costume, wearing an accordeon pleated yellow chiffon skirt, a broad gold embroidered girdle, a zouave jacket and white headdress and veil. It was an effective costume, but there were many who thought it was far from being the most effective. Mrs. Will Magee in a costume of shimmering gold was preferred by many. Mrs. Willard Drown took the second prize. She was a queen of the harem and was in gold from her head dress to her slippers. She was accompanied by Mrs. Laurence Fuller in silver. Courtenay Ford as one of the Three Musketeers, the others being Haig Patigian and Allan Dunn, took the first prize for the men and John Lawson, a French Apache, took the second. Mrs. Peter Martin, by the way, did a perfectly proper sort of turkey trot and did it very gracefully.

The Three Anonymas

There were three young women present whose names for reasons known to the bavardes never get into the society columns, but who were the center of a great deal of masculine attention and feminine comment. One was a bathing girl in the scantiest pink silk bathing suit imaginable. She was a little thing whose form, the experts said, was perfect of its kind and her curly blond hair nestled on the white shirt front of a great many well known society men in the course of the evening. When she unmasked, which was at a late hour, she proved to be very pretty. Anonyma number two appeared as a baby doll and was also importuned for dances by some of our most discriminating men. The third inconnue was a pretty little brunette who came in a scanty black costume. It was surprising what a lot of prominent men seemed to be on cordial terms with these three charmers. Yet when their wives or their sisters asked their names, the replies were deliciously evasive. One chap told his sister that the bathing girl was a "stenographer in the office" and was laughed at for his feeble effort at prevarication.

Honi Soit

Two very beautiful and well known young girls were riding on an O'Farrell street car the other day and as the car turned a corner one of them lost her balance and fell. Several gallants rushed to her assistance, inquiring if she was hurt. But her only comment was: "My goodness! if I had known that I was going to take a tumble I would have put on my very best lingerie."

No Champagne for the Girls

I mentioned recently that there is to be a thorough housecleaning in society and that a lot of undesirable young men are to be excluded from the more exclusive homes. A step in the right direction was taken at the fancy dress party which Mr. Dalton Harrison gave at the Claremont Country Club in honor of the Misses Painter. Champagne was served for the chaperons only, the young girls having to content themselves with innocuous beverages. This is the entering wedge. There has been altogether too much drinking among the belles and every effort is to be made to stop it. No champagne for girls will be the rule next season at the important functions.

To Be a June Divorcee

It was not surprising to learn from the lips of Mrs. Edith Jewell Wilson that she will commence action for divorce in June. She has been living apart from her husband for some time. Nicholas F. Wilson being a well known oil man associated in business with "Fighting Bob" Evans and his wife having been prominent in the Greenway assemblies before her domestic troubles caused her to seek comparative seclusion, it was inevitable that the family dissension should become public property. It was inevitable too that all sorts of gossipy stories should get about. From Mrs. Wilson comes the statement that all of these stories are untrue. That being the case, it is to be hoped that they will be repeated no longer. Particularly obnoxious is the tale that Wilson had an affinity in the person of one of our pretty society girls.

St. Francis of Assisi

There is one woman's club in San Francisco—only one that I know of—where papers are read by women who have instinct and enthusiasm for the subjects which they discuss, and who are able therefore to stir and quicken one's ideas and give keen enjoyment to those who have a taste for genuine intellectual diversion. There are several clubs where culture is poured out in generous streams but only one that I happen to know of where you can be warmed by the expression of ideas and sentiments which you have not encountered somewhere before, which are not the commonplaces of literature, which give you the feminine viewpoint and make it your own. This is the Caedmon Club, where I heard Miss Agnes Tobin talk of Celtic poetry some weeks ago and where I heard Mrs. Garret McEnerney talk of St. Francis last week. Mrs. McEnerney's talk was one of the most interesting and insinuatingly instructive that I ever heard. It was insinuating in its instructiveness because the manner and tone of the speaker were those of a person who had not the remotest thought of instructing anybody. She spoke with what Saint-Beuve calls "that negligence that constitutes the ease and charm of conversation." She pictured the sweetest of all Saints with clear and accurate touches, with vivacity, with charm, impressing her hearers with the sincerity of her appreciation of the most courteous of men, the most ardent of nature lovers, the most devout imitator of the simplicity and gentleness of Christ. The beautiful legends of St. Francis Mrs. McEnerney illustrated with nearly one hundred lantern slides showing her wonderful collection of photographs of works of the old masters, especially of Giotto to whom we are indebted more than to any other artist for paintings commemorative of incidents in the life of the holy man of Assisi.

Mrs. Pat and Mrs. Frank

I have just heard an interesting story about Mrs. Pat Campbell and an unnamed society woman who is evidently Mrs. Francis Carolan, as the point of the story will show. Mrs. Campbell is almost as noted for her sharp-pointed tongue as for her exotic histrionism. Her habit of saying unpleasant things has concentrated itself chiefly into the phrase "What a pity!" and Mrs. Pat uses it invariably whenever an opening occurs for her sarcastic shafts. For instance, Charles Lothian, the Frohman representative, was standing on an Oakland ferryboat with Mrs. Campbell and expatiating upon the beauties of our city as it came into view. "I was born there," ended Mr. Lothian proudly. "What a pity!" murmured Mrs. Pat, raising her eyebrows. But here is the story which interests me. It seems that the unnamed but well known society matron remarked to the actress: "I have been so anxious to meet you. Everyone says you look so much like me." "What a pity!" was the stenciled answer. As Mrs. Frank Carolan has always prided herself on her resemblance to Mrs. Campbell, takes pains to dress like Mrs. Campbell, follows closely the Campbell coiffures, always cultivates Mrs. Campbell's society and invariably appears at her openings here in the stage box in a close imitation of the actress's costume, I take it that the story is told of her.

Hit With a Golf Stick

What came near being a very serious accident occurred during the week at the Golf Club when Mrs. John D. Spreckels Jr. struck Mrs. Frank Preston a smart blow over the head with her golf stick. Mrs. Preston was stunned, but fortunately she recovered and the accidental rap has left no bad effect.

Our Superlative Women

The casual mention in one of the papers of Miss Muriel Steele, the beautiful sister of Mrs. Thomas H. Williams, immediately calls forth that old story to the effect that the late King Edward declared her the most beautiful American girl he had ever seen. I wonder if San Francisco is alone in the development of stories of this sort? Our Mrs. Sterling Postley, it will be remembered, is supposed to have been characterized by the Grand Duke Boris as the most beautiful American woman he had ever seen. Our Miss Anna Peters is said to have been declared by Charles Dana Gibson the perfect Gibson girl. Our Miss Rasmussen is supposed to have appealed to Harrison Fisher as the girl with the "slashing head" for whom he has quested far and wide. Far be it from me to question the authenticity of any of these stories. Perhaps all these statements were actually made. But just suppose they were untrue. What a lot of people would have the laugh on us!

An Interesting Engagement

An engagement which will interest many people here was made known on Tuesday in St. Louis when Miss Marie Garneau of Washington Terrace, daughter of a well known capitalist of the Missouri metropolis, announced her engagement to Mr. Theodore P. Murphy, the son of the late Eugene Murphy, one of this city's best known business men. Simultaneously with the announcement by his affianced in St. Louis Mr. Murphy gathered a number of his friends together at a stag dinner at his home in Broadway and took them into his confidence. It was a complete surprise, the romance which began last summer when Miss Garneau visited California, having been carefully guarded from his most intimate friends. Mr. Frederick Murphy, the brother of the groom-to-be, married Miss Alyce Sullivan, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. Sullivan.

Nana Returns as Ann

While the "Madame Sherry" company is in town there will be a good deal of entertaining on both sides of the bay in honor of that clever soprano, Ann Tasker, who was formerly Nana Swain of Oakland. More than one affair will be given by Miss Mary Alverta Morse by whom the young actress was instructed in the vocal art. She was Miss Morse's pupil in Oakland and also in New York.

The Harem Skirt

Will our gentlewomen wear the harem skirt? 'Tis a difficult question to answer. Time was, within memory of the young, when one might have vociferated an emphatic negative, but a change has come over the spirit of our women and one can never be sure what they will or will not do. Because a fashion is hideous or vulgar or indecent is no longer sufficient reason for declaring that it will die abornin'. Women have been making new rules of modesty for themselves in recent seasons and mere man may not hazard a guess as to how far they will carry their absurdities and audacities. To say that the harem skirt is hideous or vulgar or indecent proves nothing. Personally I think that a great many of the recent feminine modes have been both hideous and vulgar—I will not go as far as many do and say indecent too—but I am bound to admit that they have flourished like the bay tree on Lebanon in spite of my disapproval. Having seen the harem skirt I presume that I am at liberty to express an opinion. I don't like it a bit. The hobble was bad enough before some of the modistes modified it into a shape of more or less beauty, but the harem seems to lack a single redeeming feature. According to your personal viewpoint it is either funny or immodest; the wildest imagination would never regard it as pretty. But to the average woman that is immaterial. If women who are regarded as "smart dressers" decide upon wearing it, it will be generally worn. To the average woman beauty in dress is never dissociated from fashion. The average woman will throw up her hands in horror at a pretty frock which is cut on old-fashioned lines; she will burble with delight over a sartorial monstrosity that is "the mode."

It Is Being Reviled

From European capitals comes the news that the first appearance of the harem skirt has led to riots. In Paris, in Madrid and in Berlin the pioneers of the latest fashion have been pelted, insulted and chased off the streets. In London there has been a great outcry. The Countess of Warwick, considered one of the best dressed women in England, and the Marchioness of Tweeddale have denounced it. So has Lady Duff Gordon. But the grande couturiers insist that it is "the thing" and in the past their word has been law. They are not alarmed by the onslaughts that have been made on it. They can afford to laugh when women try to argue it down by declaring that it is an "atrocity which, with the suggestion of the harem, conveys eastern notions of womanhood that are far from pleasant." To a woman who wants to be in style that sort of talk is poppycock; she doesn't care the snap of her finger whether or not the harem skirt suggests the seraglio and the sultan's handkerchief. Women have persistently refused to associate moral ideas with their dress. Not even the thunderings of ecumenical councils have daunted them. The harem skirt conveys no moral or immoral idea; it simply symbolizes woman's twentieth century aspiration to wear the trousers of the household. But philosophers are reading more abstruse meanings into it. Its ugliness, they would have us believe, is premeditated, intended. A beautiful fashion, they aver, spreads so rapidly through all classes that it speedily loses its exclusiveness. Not so the ugly fashion, say the philosophers. But there are two objections to this pretty theory. In the first place, to the feminine mind there are no ugly fashions; in the second place, what man considers an ugly fashion spreads just as rapidly as a pretty one. If the harem skirt does not gain popularity we shall have the exception which proves the rule.

Mrs. Eddy Operated On

Mrs. Spencer Eddy who was formerly Miss Lurline Spreckels of this city recently underwent a successful operation for appendicitis at the hands of the celebrated woman's specialist of Berlin, Professor Bumm. The reports are that unless something unforeseen intervenes Mrs. Eddy will soon be up and about. Spencer Eddy is with his wife in the German capital. It will be remembered that he was appointed minister to Roumania two years ago, but soon afterwards resigned, in a huff, it is said, because he desired another post.

In the Social Spotlight

Since the concert which Miss Flora Wilson gave in the Hotel St. Francis for the benefit of the Armitage Orphange, there have been many inquiries as to whether she would appear again. At the urgent request of her friends and admirers she has consented to give another concert here about March 20 in Scottish Rite Hall. Miss Wilson is the daughter of the Secretary of Agriculture and has been for several seasons one of the most popular belles in Washington society.

The A. Comte's Jr. entertained thirty of their friends at a card party at their beautiful Clay street home last Saturday night. It was a delightful affair, some beautiful prizes were given, and the supper that followed a short musical program was accompanied by a feast of reason and a flow of soul.

Mr. and Mrs. Othello Scribner entertained at an elaborately appointed dinner party at the Palace preceding the Greenway assembly at the Fairmont. The guests included Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Porter, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Chanslor, Mr. and Mrs. P. E. Bowles, Major and Mrs. Haldermand Young, Mrs. R. P. Schwerin, Miss Jennie Blair, Captain Frank Wilcox, Mr. Frank Owen, and Mr. Phillip Paschel.

Mrs. Arthur Biddle and her daughter, Miss Edith Frances Biddle, spent several days at the Fairmont during the week and were entertained in an informal way.

Miss Fredda Smith gave a pretty tea party at the Palace Thursday afternoon in honor of Miss Rhoda Neibling who will leave shortly for Europe to be absent a year. The guests included Miss Neibling, Miss Erna Herrman, Miss Ila Sonntag, Miss Amalia Simpson, Miss Anna Weller, Miss Marguerite Doe, Miss Gladys Poillon, Miss Bliss, Miss Duval, Miss Katherine Pennel, Miss Edith Rucker, Miss Florence Cluff, Miss Kathleen Farrell, Miss Antoinette Keystone, Miss Elizabeth Orrick, Miss Cleo Posey, and Miss Lela Kenny of Berkeley. The party was chaperoned by Mrs. Walter Greer and Mrs. Chester Roadhouse.

Mrs. H. S. Kiersted is the guest of her mother, Mrs. Peter McG. McBean, at the Fairmont.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Parker Whitney and Mrs. Beryl Graydon are again at the Fairmont. They expect to spend most of the time in town before leaving for their summer home in the east.

Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Evans of Ross Valley who are spending the winter at the Fairmont, entertained at a large dinner party Thursday evening before the Greenway assembly.

The participants of the program will be: Miss Frances Westington, Miss Sadie Bultmann, Miss Marie Sheehan, Miss Zdenka Buben, Miss Irene De Martini, Miss Stella Coughlin, Mrs. Lois Patterson Wessitsh, Messrs. Harry Bultmann, Melton Mowbray, Harry Samuels, and Prof. Joseph Beringer.

Knox Maddox motored down to Del Monte in his car for the week-end, taking with him W. B. Carson and Harry Simpkins.

Mr. and Mrs. Martin Ratcliff of England, Harry von Echermann of Stockholm; Maurice B. Blake of Ireland who with Tom Watson of Surrey, England, is making a pleasure trip around the world, Mr. and Mrs. Burnet D. Cohn of Australia and Miss Levy of London were among the globe-trotters registered at Del Monte last week.

Archdeacon John A. Emery has gone down to Del Monte for a short vacation and a much needed rest.

One of the many Del Monte motor parties of the week included Mr. and Mrs. Louis F. Monteagle, Miss Virginia Newell Drown and the Reverend Edward Morgan who arrived at the hostelry on Tuesday, remaining several days and motoring up and down the Carmel Valley, out to the picturesque old Mission, up to Rancho del Monte and to the Lodge at Pebble Beach.

Mrs. Charles Sutro went down from the city to Del Monte with Miss Condery, spending part of the week at Carmel-by-the-Sea.

Mrs. E. M. Smith, Miss Louise and Master Russell Smith are among the latest arrivals at Del Monte from Portland. They have their big touring car with them and divide their time pretty evenly between motoring and golfing.

Gossip of the Theatre

"Madame Sherry"

Those who expected that they would find in "Madame Sherry" a comic opera to compare with "The Merry Widow" were naturally disappointed. "Madame Sherry" is not to be regarded as a pretentious piece. It hasn't the plot beauty of "The Merry Widow" and its music lacks originality. But there isn't the slightest indication that its authors intended to emulate the Marsovian opera. Their intention was merely to compose a tuneful entertainment and in this they certainly achieved great success. For "Madame Sherry" is delicious. From first to last the music titillates the ear voluptuously. The constantly recurring "Every Little Movement" theme brings a new pleasure at every repetition. Cafe orchestras cannot wither it or phonographs stale its power to please. It comes o'er the ear like the sweet south that breathes upon a bank of violets, stealing and giving odor. The man to whom it is not beautiful is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils. Because it is not as fine as the Merry Widow waltz is no reason why it should not excite our enthusiasm. Let us have it again and yet again! And let those beautiful girls in their "esthetic" draperies sway to its insinuating undulations! This is the sort of interpretative dancing which we can all appreciate and applaud. It ravishes the eye and bothers the brain with no deep-laid symbols. Nothing in "Madame Sherry" taxes the brain. You need only look, listen and enjoy. The stage pictures are charming, the costumes must win the approbation of the most exacting. And the cast is exceptional. Miss Ann Tasker comes back to us a good singer, a graceful dancer and an actress of bewitching ingenuousness. The ladies coo admiringly whenever she trips across the stage and the men affirm the judgment. Miss Cheridah Simpson, more cushiony and amplitudinous than of yore, is neverfailingly and infectiously happy. Miss Mary Quive has much of the charm of her dark-eyed dashing sister Grace Van Studdiford. Miss Lottie Kendal is a South American amoreuse of tabasco temperament and glowing allurement. Any of these women would distinguish an ordinary cast. Together they claim a place in one's theatrical memories. Among the men stands out Oscar Figman, a great character actor. He has a better role than he had in "The Merry Widow." One does not get enough of him. Max sat in the audience on Monday night and was very proud of his brother. The other men are very good too. There is not a jarring note in the entire performance. It is an entertainment worth going a long way to see. Having seen it once you want to see it again. To refrain from enjoying it would be a severe Lenten discipline. —Edward F. O'Day.

The last performances of "The Midnight Sons" will be given at the Savoy today and on Sunday night Gertrude Elliott will begin an engagement of one week in "The Dawn of a To-Morrow." Miss Elliott (Mrs. Forbes-Robertson) is virtually a newcomer to this city, though older theatergoers may remember her in "When We Were Twenty-One," with Nat Goodwin and her handsome sister, Maxine. She has since won an enviable position in England and her presentation of "The Dawn of a To-Morrow" was an event of the last London season. Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett is the author of the play. The entire cast is practically that which appeared with Miss Elliott in London. It includes Fuller Mellish, Scott Gatty, Sydney Booth, Angela Ogden and Julia Blanc. A special matinee will be given on Thursday.

The Bonci Concerts

Bonci, the great lyric tenor, will give his first concert at the Columbia this Sunday afternoon, offering a program of songs by German, French, Italian and American composers besides operatic arias. The following Sunday afternoon he will sing an entirely different program including, by special request, Dvorak's charming "Songs My Mother Taught Me," and Chadwick's "Nocturne." Bonci will furnish the fourth program of the St. Francis Musical Art Society's concert next Tuesday.

Max Figman at the Alcazar

Max Figman, than whom there is not a more talented or popular comedian on the American stage, will open a brief engagement at the Alcazar next Monday evening in "The Man on the Box," the play with which his fame is mostly identified. He will be supported by Lolita Robertson and the Alcazar players. In the title part Mr. Figman is inimitably amusing and Miss Robertson is equally effective as the girl he loves. All the established Alcazar favorites are in the cast, Viola Leach, Bessie Barriscale, Howard Hickman, Will R. Walling, and Burt Wesner. Elaborate and artistic staging is promised.

Busoni, Then Mischa Elman

Ferruccio Busoni, the famous Italian pianist, will give the first concert in the new Scottish Rite Auditorium on Sunday afternoon, March 19. It is probable that an Oakland concert will also be arranged. Will Greenbaum also announces that Mischa Elman, the young Russian virtuoso of the violin, will give three concerts, the first being scheduled for Sunday, March 26.

What the Columbia Offers

"Madame Sherry" at the Columbia is said to be doing the biggest business in the history of the house. The reservations for the second week are unprecedented and from all appearances the musical comedy will make a new record for profitable runs. The next attraction at the Columbia will be Francis Wilson in his own comedy, "The Bachelor's Baby." Ruth St. Denis will make her first appearance here next month.

A Varied Bill at the Orpheum

For the second and last week of his engagement at the Orpheum Elbert Hubbard will deliver a new series of "Heart to Heart Talks." The Four Huntings, said to be the best singers and dancers in their line on the stage will present "The Fool House." Mike Bernard, billed as "the champion ragtime player" and Willie Weston, a singer of character songs, will be in the bill. Mr. and Mrs. Jimmie Barry will give their comic skit, "At Hensfoot Corner." Harry Armstrong's latest one-act play "The Fire Commissioner" will receive its first presentation in this city. The daylight motion pictures will be continued. Next week will be the last of The Empire Comedy Four, Walter Graham and his manikin music hall and Bird Millman and her wire artists.

Fanciful Comedy at Ye Liberty

Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, has a splendid vehicle for next week in "When Knights Were Bold," the comedy in which Francis Wilson was seen here last. It treats farcically the good old past in the light of twentieth century commonsense, and is one of the funniest things the stage has known for many years. George Friend, who will be missed from Ye Liberty stage after this month, will have Wilson's role and will be ably assisted by all the Oakland favorites. "Colorado," a play by Augustus Thomas new to the West, is announced to follow.

The Etiquette of Being Lynched

After the first performance of "The Girl of the Golden West" Caruso was praised by the critics for his success in acting and looking like a California "road agent," but exception was taken by some of the more captious to one detail—the abject fear he showed when he was about to be hanged. That was pronounced extremely un-Western. The real thing is amusingly illustrated in a book just published, "Life on the Pacific Coast," the author of which, former Congressman Samuel D. Woods of Stockton, tells of the execution of one of these Californian desperadoes. He was a horse thief, and when the spring was about to be touched which would land him in eternity, he shouted to the crowd: "Here we go, girls!" and that ended his career.

Belasco's Inspiration

David Belasco has been talking to the newspaper interviewer. David is always interesting when he talks, just as he is always interesting, if not convincing, when he writes. David says that "The Girl from the Golden West" is the best work he has done. He is very proud of the big scene in that play, the scene where the blood from a wounded man drips from a room above upon the table where his pursuers are playing poker. He says that many think this incident not only melodramatic but improbable. And he insists that it not only could, but did happen. He says that his father who was a California pioneer told him the incident. As a matter of fact, he says, his father was present when the incident occurred. This induces wonder. Is David Belasco's memory perfectly sound? Is he quite sure that his father told him about seeing that incident? Or did his father, some time or other, narrate it to little David as a thrilling scene from a great novel? If David Belasco cares to refresh his memory he will find the original of that "Girl from the Golden West" incident in a chapter entitled "The Rain of Blood" in a novel called "Monte Cristo." Most of us had shuddered with Caderousse when the hot blood dripped on his face long before "The Girl from the Golden West" was written. Thomas Hardy had even borrowed the idea for "Tess of the d'Urbevilles."

Isadora's Fads

Miss Isadora Duncan, says an Eastern paper, made a tremendous success of her latest appearance in Paris, notwithstanding a cruel article against her by the celebrated Adheaurne de Chevigne. She danced her way into the heart of an extremely rich Anglo-American, who is talking of divorce in order to court the bouncing Isadora. She hesitates. She is an apostle of free love, and does not wish to recognize matrimonial ties. The wife of the Anglo-American, meanwhile, has been compelled to leave her husband's Parisian home; and now she is forbidden by her "yet" lord and master to return to her English home, where Isadora is expected to come and reign. The world, which has heard of the former infatuation of the Anglo-American for one of the most beautiful peeresses of Great Britain, is rather inclined to side against the man. Perhaps it is on account of the grace and accomplishments of the legal wife, perhaps on account of the handsome Marchioness, who is abandoned now for a dancer. The romance has yet another interesting side. Isadora Duncan, who has lost much of her youth, beauty and good figure, is credited with taking up new fads: she is going to adopt a stray waif found by her in one of her trips to Egypt or somewhere in the East. Her other fad is too terrible even to mention: she is infatuated with Gabriele d'Annunzio after the mere reading of the novel, "Forse che si, forse—du no!" D'Annunzio will never be able to escape the fleet-footed Isadora!

Rose Stahl and a Shop Girl

When Rose Stahl was rehearsing Maggie Pepper, Charles Klein's new play in which she is starring, a shopping expedition of hers made her acquainted with a young lady in a large department store in New York. The willingness on the part of the shop girl to please Miss Stahl, created a friendship between them, so much so that when the actress had occasion to go to the store, she always singled out this young lady to wait on her. One day Miss Stahl went into the store and up to the department where her acquaintance was employed, and immediately noticed a reserve on the part of the shop girl, which was rather unusual. Her actions were so radically different, and her manner so distrait, that Miss Stahl asked her if she was feeling well. "Perfectly well, thank you," was the reply; "and, by the way, I heard yesterday that you were rehearsing in a new play in which you 'carry off' a shop girl. I just came to the conclusion that your apparent friendliness was merely to make use of me in playing your part, and I am not so crazy about the stage that I want to see myself portrayed. If you want to study types, it would please me very much if you would take somebody else." Nothing that Miss Stahl could say could convince the young lady that she was in error.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Little explanation of the big break in stocks is necessary, in view of the expected rate increase by the Interstate Commerce Commission which was not realized by the decision handed down. There was genuine disappointment, from Wall Street to every business center in the country, and such was the feeling in speculative circles that the tendency was to sell long commitments at any price that they would bring. Hence the market was congested with selling orders and prices broke sharply. It seems entirely too early to discuss the effects of this rate situation and while the majority of the leading railway and banking interests are greatly disappointed in this matter there are those who take a passive view of the situation and feel actually bullish on the outlook. There was some good buying at the close of the week which gave the market a natural rally. We feel it time to be conservative, however, and await the important Supreme Court decisions pending.

Wheat—Further downward drifting of wheat prices was seen last week and with but four months of the present crop remaining the trade has come to see the situation more clearly. Many theories which clouded the view have been exploded by trade developments as time has passed. Supplies of wheat in Chicago, instead of melting away before the close of the Lake navigation last fall, as had been freely forecasted by some, bid fair to remain large when navigation opens in the spring and it is by no means sure that there will not be a large supply carried into the new crop in July. In fact all the large distributing houses here freely predict this. The last two weeks have seen actual though slight increases in receipts over shipments and very faint actual reductions, due to the milling inroads locally. Unfortunately the situation in Chicago is but typical of that prevailing at all other important centers of accumulation, and the demoralized condition of the flour trade indicates that the interior supplies are not vastly different from those at the big centers. In any event, there is little prospect that a period of even approximate scarcity can develop in the few months remaining of the present crop year. Similar conditions prevail all over Europe, both the importing and exporting countries having large supplies. Meanwhile the southern hemisphere has begun its shipments, thus far showing about the same total as a year ago. India will soon be in the list but the movement from all these countries will probably not be rushed, in view of the weakness shown in Europe.

Corn—Values declined last week but losses were slight as compared with the decline in wheat. One of the sustaining influences was the covering of a big line of shorts for a local speculator who was influenced by considerations other than trade. There was a light run of receipts due to the rough weather of the preceding week.

Cotton—Speculation in cotton during the week has been quiet at irregular prices with the final prices about the same as last Saturday. On Friday notices for 75,000 bales of March were issued and taken up, mostly by a prominent bull operator. Spot markets in the south have been quiet and more or less depressed. Cotton goods have not met with a satisfactory sale and prices both for cloths and yarns have shown more or less weakness. Curtailment for the week was heavy, amounting to 175,000 pieces in this country. The news from the south makes it clear that a very large acreage will be planted under the stimulus of present high prices. The sharp decline in the New York and London stock markets had some effect here and in Liverpool but good support was given the markets and further demoralization was averted. We look for a traders' market around this level for a time, followed by a substantial decline later if new crop prospects continue favorable.

A Sonnet to Heavenly Beauty

If this our little life is but a day.
In the Eternal,—if the years in vain
Toil after hours that never come again,—
If everything that hath been must decay,
Why dreamest thou of joys that pass away,
My soul, that my sad body doth restrain?
Why of the moment's pleasure art thou fain?
Nay, thou hast wings,—nay, seek another stay.

There is the joy whereto each soul aspires,
And there the rest that all the world desires.
And there is love, and peace, and gracious mirth;
And there in the most highest heavens shalt thou
Behold the Very Beauty, whereof now
Thou worshippest the shadow upon earth.

A Stubborn Opening

The head of the household was going through her husband's pockets the next morning.

"What kept you out so late last night?" she suddenly demanded.

"It was the opening of the campaign, my dear," the lesser half replied.

"Well, it didn't take three corkscrews to open it, did it?"

And she drew the offending articles from his side pocket and waved them before him.

"Why do you do that?" asked Hans curiously.

"North-northeast," said Sanders. "That's the direction. Now then, the distance. Count very carefully the number of steps from the hidden treasure to the hollow oak."

Hans conscientiously performed his task and returned with the information that he had counted thirty-seven steps and a little bit over. "We might say thirty-seven and a half."

"Very well," said Sanders. "Let us say thirty-seven and a half. South-southwest."

Hans was guilty of a critical observation: "A little while ago you said north-northeast."

"Of course I said that. It depends upon whether you are standing here by the bush or there by the hollow oak."

"Aha!" exclaimed Hans, not altogether convinced. "And what now?"

Sanders pondered for a moment. "You might go somewhere near the church. But don't walk through town. Take some of the roundabout ways outside of the city. If anyone tries to speak to you, S. Q. P. When you have once got to the church, wait for me. Perhaps I shall be there in a few moments, possibly it will be several hours. If I am not there toward evening you need not expect to see me anymore alive, and you may go home."

Hans had unbounded trust in his leader and he obeyed these commands without the slightest hesitation. Sanders remained alone in the hazel-nut bush. He did not yet know what he would do. He was considering the matter. But he did not have long to wait. The graceful, pretty looking girl appeared, slowly retracing her steps, her eyes rigidly fixed upon the ground. Sanders guessed immediately that she was looking for her pocketbook. He forsook his hiding-place and came up behind her.

Politely lifting his cap in the air he said, "Excuse me, are you looking for a pocketbook?"

"Yes," replied the girl, breathing a sigh of relief. "Have you, by any chance, found it?"

"No, I have not."

"But you have it?"

"No, but I might be able to find it."

"How? Why? What do you mean?"

"Perhaps you noticed as you crossed the playground that three men were following you?" asked Sanders. The girl looked at him full of amazement, and Sanders felt flattered.

"No," said she; "I noticed nothing. I don't believe I even looked behind me."

"Oh, yes!" replied Sanders with decision. "One of them—I think he must have been the leader of the gang—looked like a Spaniard." The astonishment which up to this time had been displayed upon the girl's face gave way to a droll curiosity. Sanders continued calmly: "In the same moment that you dropped your pocketbook this man rushed up toward it. A fierce battle ensued, for the question arose as to how the money should be divided. They could not come to an agreement and, having other plans on hand for the time being, they determined to bury the pocketbook and to divide the spoil later. In consequence of certain facts which have been made known to me, I observed these men very closely at the time. They went up to that hazel-nut bush over there and I do not doubt that they buried the money under it. We shall see at once."

"But you are the most extraordinary boy I have ever seen!" cried the girl. "Have you invented all that by yourself?"

"We shall see at once," replied Sanders with dignity. "If I have invented it, your pocketbook will not be there. But if we find it hidden under the hazel-nut bush, you will know that I speak the truth."

As they came near to the bush Sanders looked searchingly in every direction. Then, examining the ground, he asked suddenly:

"Do you see a place where the earth has been freshly dug up?"

"No, I really don't."

"That is because you are not accustomed to such work. Look at this line of dust—and at this one, too. They are much too straight to be there by chance. I should imagine that the ground has been removed here and that something lies concealed beneath it." He got down upon his hands and knees and found his prophecy to be absolutely correct. He opened the cut with his fingers, raised up the piece of turf, drew forth the pocketbook and handed it triumphantly to the girl.

"That is simply wonderful!" cried the girl enthusiastically. "I can't understand it. And the money is all there, every pfennig of it. Now that you have got back my pocketbook for me, I don't know how I shall thank you enough. Perhaps—" she hesitated, but a small boy certainly could not be offended—"perhaps, you will let me give you one of these gold-pieces? Will you accept it as a token of my graititude for your intelligence?"

"I thank you very much," replied Sanders, "but I never accept money for such things. I do it because it gives me pleasure."

"You are a dear boy," said the girl, "and the most remarkable fellow I ever saw. But one thing I hope you will let me do—I want to give you a kiss."

She immediately carried her design into execution. Sanders was by no means a youth who had been spoiled through much kissing, and this kiss became the great triumph of the day to him. He only regretted that his faithful comrade and vassal had not been witness to the deed. Besides all this the girl told him that she was Fraulein Meinhof, and that she would expect him to call on her some afternoon. She gave him her visiting card that he might not forget her address.

"What is your name?" she asked.

"Nemo!" answered Sanders who had not read Jules Verne in vain.

"I shall tell my family all about Nemo," said the girl laughingly; "but you really must call on us sometime. And many thanks indeed. Goodbye, Nemo."

Sanders, also called Nemo, hastened toward the church. There he found the entire polytechnic school gathered; among them Hans, who was awaiting him.

"Listen," said he to Sanders, "we are in luck! The old man gave us a holiday this afternoon on account of the heat, so we sha'n't be punished after all. Did you know anything about it?"

Sanders shrugged his shoulders. "I could have found it out if it had been of any importance to me. But when I have this sort of work to do, I cannot be disturbed with other things. Now I have done what you ought to have done and did not do. I pursued that girl and tracked her down, and under certain conditions which I prescribed and she accepted, I gave the pocketbook back to her."

"How much did she give you?" asked Hans eagerly.

"I did not allow her to offer me anything. If you doubt my word—"

"Oh, I don't doubt it at all!" cried Hans.

"If you doubt my word," continued Sanders, "take this card and call on her in her home. Say it was Nemo who sent you, and ask whether the pocketbook has not been returned."

"I can't understand," said Hans, "where you find out all these things!"

"Certainly not, and you will never be able to understand," replied Sanders complacently.

"Is it all over now?"

"As far as you are concerned, it is all over. You may play now with the others, if you desire it. But on your way home don't forget our school-bags out there on the oak tree."

"Aren't you coming along?" asked Hans.

"Impossible!" declared Sanders. "Before the sun goes down I have another task to perform far more mysterious than the first; and this one I must perform alone."

And he went home and for half an hour practised conscientiously on his violin.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY AN ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California Dept. No. 10, Probate, No. 29, N. S.

In the matter of the Estate of JULIUS FRIEDMAN, Deceased.

Edward R. Lande and I. M. Friedberg, Executors of the Last Will and Testament of Julius Friedman, deceased, having presented to the Court, and filed herein, their duly verified petition praying for an Order of Sale of Real Property belonging to the estate of said decedent, hereinafter described, and it appearing to the Court from said petition that it would be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of said estate, and those interested therein, that said real property, the sale of which is asked for in said petition, should be sold, and good cause appearing therefor,

It is hereby ordered by the Court that all persons interested in said estate appear before this Court, Department No. 10, Probate, at the Courtroom of said Department, in the Grant Building, on the Southeast corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, on Wednesday, the 22d day of March, 1911, at ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, to show cause why an Order should not be granted to said Executors for the sale of all that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Southeasterly line of Harrison Street with the Northeasterly line of Beale Street; running thence Northeasterly and along said line of Harrison Street thirty (30) feet; thence at right angles Southeasterly eighty (80) feet; thence at right angles Southwesterly thirty (30) feet to said line of Beale Street, and thence at right angles Northwesterly and along said last mentioned line eighty (80) feet to the point of commencement, being a portion of 100 Vara Block No. 333, together with the improvements thereon.

Further ordered that a copy of this Order be published once a week for four successive weeks before the time appointed for said hearing, in "Town Talk," a weekly newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Done in Open Court this 15th day of February, 1911.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 34,365.

HATTIE ELIZA POND, Plaintiff, vs. WILLIAM H. POND, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, Send Greeting to: William H. Pond, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful neglect of plaintiff, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion of plaintiff, and on the ground of defendant's habitual intemperance; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 24th day of February, A. D. 1911.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 30,014, Department No. 4.

SARA M. DALY, Plaintiff, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Hereinafter Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

Action in rem to establish and quiet Plaintiff's title to real property and to determine all adverse claims thereto.

The People of the State of California, to All Persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Sara M. Daly, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above-entitled Court, and City and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the north line of Randolph Street, distant twenty-five (25) feet easterly from the east line of Ramsell Street and running thence east twenty-five (25) feet; thence north one hundred (100) feet; thence west twenty-five (25) feet; thence south one hundred (100) feet to to the point of commencement; and being Lot 7 of Block 37 of the City Land Association as shown on a map of the same recorded on August 24, 1870, in the office of the Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, and being also the same premises heretofore conveyed to Annie A. Daly (widow) by Anne McCormac by deed recorded August 2, 1897, in Volume 1748 of Deeds, Old Series, Records of the City and County of San Francisco.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That this Court by its final judgment and decree, may ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, and may adjudge said plaintiff to be the owner in fee and in possession of said lands, and may establish and quiet its title thereto against all persons whomsoever claiming or to claim the same, and for such other relief in the premises as may be meet and equitable.

Witness my hand and seal of said Court this 31st day of December, A. D. 1910.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 30,016, Department No. 4.

JOHN J. CASSIDY, ANNIE CECILIA WIEGNER, MARY I. GREELY and VIRGINIA CASSIDY WILBUR, Plaintiffs, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to All Persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of John J. Cassidy, Annie Cecilia Wiegner, Mary I. Greely and Virginia Cassidy Wilbur, plaintiffs, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County within three (3) months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows, to-wit:

1st. Commencing on the Northerly line of Pine Street at a point distant one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches Westerly from the Westerly line of Broderick Street; thence Westerly along the Northerly line of Pine Street twenty-seven (27) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles Easterly twenty-seven (27) feet and six inches; and thence at right angles Southerly and parallel with said line of Broderick Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement. Being a portion of Fifty (50) Vara Lot Number Two (2), in Block No. 540 as designated upon a certain map entitled "Hoadley's Extension of the Western Addition," which said map was recorded May 10, 1862, in the office of the Recorder of said City and County.

2nd. Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Southerly line of Geary Street (formerly Point Lobos Avenue) with the Easterly line of Second Avenue; thence Southerly along said line of Second Avenue one Hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles Easterly Thirty-two (32) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred (100) feet to the Southerly line of Geary Street; thence at right angles Westerly along said line of Geary Street thirty-two (32) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement; being part of Outside Lands Block No. 283.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer the plaintiffs will apply to the Courts for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: judgment of said Court which shall ascertain, determine and adjudge all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said real property and every part thereof, and which shall ascertain, determine and adjudge that plaintiffs are the owners in fee simple absolute and in the actual and peaceable possession of said real property and every part thereof, and that their title thereto is forever established and quieted.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 31st day of December, A. D. 1910.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 32,385.

ADELE NOVARESE, Plaintiff, vs. JOSEPH ROBERT NOVARESE, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, Send Greeting to Joseph Robert Novarese, Defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed herein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 26th day of October, A. D. 1910.

Auto Notes

Interest in the San Francisco Automobile Show which is to be held for a week beginning next Saturday evening in the Pavilion Rink, is very general. The announcement has been made that the Fiat will be among the exhibitors. The Pacific Motor Car Company of Los Angeles, which has the agency for the Fiat for the Pacific Coast territory, reserved the space by wire. The Fiat is easily one of the most popular of foreign cars and has created wide interest because of its long line of racing victories in both this country and Europe. As with several other cars this will be the first time that the Fiat ever exhibited in a Pacific Coast show. Among the other makes which will be seen for the first time in an exhibit here are the S. G. V. and the Amplex.

A number of the exhibits for the show have just arrived or are en route and in close proximity to San Francisco. The Premiers are among the cars that have arrived and E. C. Collins reports that the new Cartercar fore door and truck models will be here. The Mathewson is to have a car for exhibition brought especially for the occasion from the Chicago show. A big yellow American car, easily one of the most handsome machines that ever came to San Francisco, has just arrived from Chicago. According to the Motor Sales Company of California the Inter-State exhibit will be almost a duplicate of their famous display at this year's Madison Square Gardens show in New York.

Glenn D. Edwards of Los Angeles is a Diamond tire advocate. Mr. Edwards owns a Pope Hartford car with which he has made 5000 miles with Diamond equipment on all four wheels. He has had only one puncture. He declares that he has required unusually hard service of the car.

One of the most important and significant changes that has occurred in the motor car industry during the past twelve months is the passing of the E. R. Thomas Motor Company of Buffalo, from the control of the Thomases into the hands of the well-known financial house of Eugene Meyer, Jr., & Co., of New York City. The Meyer interests have secured a small group of officials from the Packard Motor Car Company and have given them absolute control of the reorganization of the Thomas Company and its subsequent operation. This group has been carefully chosen with a view to placing a master at the head of each of the important departments of production, marketing and finance.

C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of the Diamond Rubber Company, is in Los Angeles on a short business trip. After a hurried study of the tire situation in the Southern California metropolis he will return to San Francisco.

Automobile and accessory manufacturers expect the market for cars and tires in the Philippine Islands and the far east to reach considerable proportions. Latest reports show 400 cars in the city of Manila alone. Automobiles are already numerous in the rubber-producing island of Ceylon, and the Federated Malay States and the East Indies. The automobile also has a good representation in India, China and Japan with the demand increasing every year. Within the last week a set of Diamond tires was shipped to the Hon. W. Cameron Forbes, Governor-General of the Philippine Islands. These will be used on his machine. News has just reached the Diamond Rubber Company that at a meeting of Chiefs of Departments in the City of Manila the purchasing agent was instructed to buy Diamond tires for all department automobiles.

Stones of Healing

Stones of healing, as they used to be called, may not have been quite such fakes as skeptical moderns think. Precious stones were prepared medicinally by: First, powdering, that is, by grinding; second, calcination, by fire or corrosion; third, purification; fourth, liquidation; fifth, distillation or volatilization, that is, dissolved in spirits of wine and distilled; sixth, sirupization, solution mixed with citron, barberries, sugar and water. Powder of emeralds, in doses of 30 to 40 grains, was considered an astringent. It stanched blood and strengthened the eyes. Powdered topaz and rosewater prevented bleeding and was good for digestion; it was sold by apothecaries as an antidote to madness, and when taken in time, cured asthma and induced sleep. Powder of rubies was usually taken in doses of 30 to 40 grains "to strengthen the vitals and restore lost strength!" and also prevented infection. Sapphires are highly electric; there was powder of sapphire and oil of sapphire. Powder of sapphire healed boils and sores, and was also good for the eyes. Pearls were given in consumption, cured quartan, ague, strengthened the nerves. Pearls were sometimes taken in doses of six grains in water, "or dissolved in vinegar, barberry juice or lemons." Poison was the terror of the Middle Ages. It is natural, therefore, to find many remedies among gems—the jacinth, the sapphire, the diamond, the cornelian, the ruby, the agate, the toadstone, the bezoar stone were all used as antidotes to poison. The Lee Penny was a famous stone of healing set in a coin brought back from the crusades by one of the Lockharts of Lee. In the reign of Charles I the laird of Lee lent the penny to the inhabitants of Newcastle, where the plague was raging, receiving as pledge $30,000.

Letters

Some More Jack London Tales

A new collection of a dozen of Jack London's short stories under the title "When God Laughs" has just been brought out by the Macmillan Company. They are all grim and ghastly enough, not designed for nervous women, timid children and dainty and delicate folks generally. Perhaps there are but few who can relish the whole volume at a sitting. The verselet on the subtitle page gives an index to the purport of the tales:

"As any one is
So is his God.
And thus is God
Oft strangely odd."

"An Apostate" takes up a phase of the child-labor question which is generally overlooked or ignored, that of the sacrifice made of the elder members of the brood in order that the younger ones may profit. They become little fathers and mothers at the age of four or five, are sent to work as soon as any one will pay them even a microscopic wage, and underfed, overworked they see "the children" indulged and kept at school often long after they have ceased to profit by it, in order that they may be fitted for genteel occupations which will enable them to look down on the ignorant elder brother or sister. Meanwhile they show neither gratitude nor appreciation, but take it all as a matter of course, while the parents shelter themselves behind the excuse that they are "doing the best they can." There is a rough sort of justice in "Just Meat," though it is anything but poetic, and a ghastly humor in the conversation of the two thieves with their half million of plunder, each of whom has secretly administered strychnine to the other in the hope of bearing off the loot alone, and while they await the action of the drug, fall into a discussion of death and the hereafter. "The Chicago" gives a glimpse into the Oriental philosophy which permits a Chinese laborer to pass unmoved through a trial and conviction for a crime which he did not commit, engaged in speculation as to the train of reasoning which would lead the Occidental mind into such manifest error, and it is not at all unlikely that it is a transcript from life, for the superior white man, dealing with other races, is not unapt to consider one victim as good or as bad as another for the sake of example. In every one of the twelve stories tragedy or the averting of it is the result of some trifling incident overlooked or unattained, some effort to circumvent or change fate. The thing that is designed or planned for is missed by a narrow margin. "The gods may not be kind but they are often merciful." The stakes are swept from the table and the game is abruptly ended, for better or for worse, whether it be by the chance word of a hospital doctor which gives a would-be suicide the hint which enables him to carry out his plan, or the lack of means which deprives the prize fighter of the bit of steak which would have given him the necessary ounce of strength to win his bout, or the upward glance which would have shown the shipwrecked crew of the Francis Spaight the needlessness of the murder of one of their number. The gods laugh with or at some one always. Always some plan is frustrated, oftentimes it seems in malicious sport. Those of us who are already enlisted amongst the admirers of Mr. London will be glad to add the volume to our shelves but it is hardly calculated to make new friends for him.

"The Diary of a Refugee"

The fault one is inclined to find with "The Diary of a Refugee" is that there is so little of it, even though it has been amplified in parts by the daughter of the keeper of the original records, the wife of a Louisiana planter. The narrative concerns the fortunes of the family only during the period between the capture of New Orleans and the close of the Civil War, which left them practically penniless, and as became a gentlewoman of her generation, the lady touches very lightly on political matters. They appear to have been fortunate, or forehanded enough to have kept themselves well supplied with coin, and so, in the worst of circumstances they were able to purchase suupplies if there was anything to be had, and after abandoning the plantation and consuming such provisions as they had taken with them, their main difficulty was to find anything in the way of food or clothing which could be bought for any sum, or any sort of shelter while making their way to Texas where so many of the Southerners hoped to re-establish themselves. The narrative abounds in interesting glimpses both of the home life on the plantation and the incidents of travel. The editor seems inadvertently to have omitted the family surname, but the gentleman whose fortunes concern us was a northern man who, naturally enough sympathized with the southern cause, and in the darkest days of the war his New York partner became panic stricken lest the property in that city should be confiscated so, without consultation or advice he sacrificed everything. This decided them that it would be wise to leave America for the time being and locate in Europe, where it would be possible to hold communion by letter with attorneys and agents, and there followed another journey, this time through Mexico to an obscure sea port and then to Havana, thence to Liverpool in a coasting steamer which proved to be unspeakably dirty, of doubtful sea worthiness, and was more than a month making the voyage. The diarist took a real interest in the welfare of the negroes both during the period of slavery and afterward. Indeed the Southern women usually did as a matter of course and a plain duty much the same work that is now exploited by philanthropists as a new discovery under the name of settlement work. She saw far enough ahead to appreciate some of the dangers and difficulties which have arisen through the wholesale emancipation of the slaves without preliminary training in responsible independence, their inability to understand the difference between liberty and license and that owners were emancipated just as much as the servants. The journal has been written without any show of heat or passion, calmly and with a coolness which is surprising when we consider the circumstances. It has been published in response to a request of a Southern Historical Society which has urged all those who have original documents to make them public, and it is the more valuable that it does not concern itself with battles and leaders but only with the domestic trials and tragedies. Moffatt, Yard & Co. are the publishers for Mrs. Frances Fearn.

Plenty of Game

"Can I have some shooting on your farm?" asked the visitor.

"By all means," responded the farmer, heartily. "There are two tramps in the barn, a sewing machine agent at the kitchen door, and a collector ringing the front door bell at this moment. Please go and shoot them all."

Bourne and Lorimer

If Senator Jonathan Bourne of Oregon were a man with a sense of the proprieties even but faintly developed he would have refrained from participation in the discussion of the Lorimer case. There is some doubt as to whether Lorimer is entitled to a seat in the Senate. There is none as to whether Bourne should be excluded. Bourne is a product of the direct primary system. The principle of that system is that senators should be elected by the people and that the people should have every available means of judging the character of the men who appeal to their suffrage. Now it is notorious that Jonathan Bourne by the use of his wealth deprived the people of Oregon of the means of estimating either his worth or the worth of his opponents. The principal aid to enlightenment in a political contest is the press. Controversy by which truth is discovered is conducted chiefly by the press. When Jonathan Bourne was a candidate for the Senate there was very little controversy in the press, the reason being that most of the newspaper editors of Oregon were induced to sign one of two contracts or both. By the terms of one contract it was provided that Jonathan Bourne should be supported for the Senate. By the terms of the other it was provided that the name of no other candidate should be printed during the campaign. This system for the promotion and suppression of publicity cost Jonathan Bourne in the neighborhood of $80,000, and the money was well spent for the purposes of the Oregonian millionaire. He was elected to the Senate by the power of wealth, by the wholesale corruption of the Fourth Estate, the honesty of which under the direct primary system is quite as important to the people as the honesty of any of the departments of government. And this Jonathan Bourne who, before he broached his barrel, was hardly known outside of a fast coterie in Oregon is now one of the leading Progressives and reformers in Washington, and he not only voted but spoke against the admission of Senator Lorimer, who, in his private life at least, is a man of clean habits and with impulses that are much more likely to lead to uprightness in public life than those of the licentious Bourne.

Commissioner Lane

Fame is likened unto a river because it is narrowest at its source and broadest afar off. This we see exemplified in the case of Interstate Commerce Commissioner Franklin K. Lane, to whom those reckless gossips, the magazines, are now paying the tribute of their admiration. Here, where Franklin K. Lane is known intimately, his fame seems more like the echo of false merit than the perfume of great deeds; for his acquaintances, such is the perversity of man, are more likely to ponder the catalogue of his weaknesses and infirmities than to celebrate his virtues and attainments. And this disposition becomes more pronounced when one reads in the magazines the story of Mr. Lane's wonderful achievements as a civic patriot in San Francisco. According to the magazines Mr. Lane purged and temporarily purified this incorrigible city. In short Common Fame, that awful liar that sometimes tells the truth, is crediting Mr. Lane with achievements of which his San Francisco admirers never heard. Lane, it is true, is a civic patriot. He is such by instinct and profession. He apprenticed himself to politics as soon as he emerged from college, and from the start he was always for good government. There is no doubt of that. But as a matter of fact Mr. Lane never created a stir as a militant reformer. He was always content to glide into a job in the easiest way. As City Attorney he was as mild-mannered a reformer as ever glued his ear to the ground. He ran for Governor, was elected and counted out in the interest of the purest of his sex, the Hon. George C. Pardee. He ran for Mayor, and was badly beaten, and that was indeed a calamity for the city, but a boon for Mr. Lane. If he had been elected, President Roosevelt, perhaps, would never have had the opportunity to reward him for the many kind things that he had said during the gubernatorial campaign. For, be it known, Mr. Lane vindicated his foresight when, as a candidate of the Democratic Party, he boomed the Republican President from one end of the State to the other. Mr. Lane indeed is one of the most far-seeing of politicians. He is also a man of considerable ability, and as a lawyer he might have risen to a decent height in his profession if his taste had been for the law and he had applied to the study of it the same power of concentration that he applied to job-chasing. As we look back over Mr. Lane's career and reflect on the character of the politicians who at the present day are devoting themselves to the pee-pul's interests, we feel constrained to amend the estimate that we formed of the commissioner from California at a time when we found him as City Attorney practicing the wiles of the professional job-chaser. A thorough-paced politician is Mr. Lane, inclined to drift with, rather than to correct, public sentiment, but on the whole a man of integrity with a sense of decency and considerable self-respect. At heart a man vastly superior to most of the men with whom he is associated in public life.

Our Labor Tyrants

Several weeks ago it was reported in the daily papers that the Alaska Packers' Association was seriously thinking of removing its offices and shipping point from the port of San Francisco to San Diego. According to one paper the corporation was dissatisfied because of the inadequacy of harbor accommodations. According to another paper the corporation was merely trying to intimidate the harbor commissioners in the interest of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company and against the Bates & Cheeseborough Company. All of which is about as near to the truth as our dailies ever get when the truth is likely to excite feeling against organized labor. When it became known that there was a prospect of our losing the business of a corporation which has an annual pay roll of $2,000,000 nearly all of which is paid in this city, the Merchants' Association appointed a committee to interview Henry F. Fortmann, the president of the company. To that commitee Mr. Fortmann made the following statement in writing:

The same thing that has driven away nearly all of the other industries is having its effect with the Alaska Packers' Association. The continually increasing demands and breaking of promises on the part of the labor interests, especially the fishermen of late, can have but one outcome. This company does not intend to reduce wages, but it cannot accede to unwarranted demands of its already well-paid employes for increased remuneration. The Association is fortunately in a position where it can move its base of operations without any loss or serious inconvenience, and in consequence is not compelled to go into a labor war for its existence. The government of San Francisco has always proven itself very weak during times of industrial strife and unable or unwilling to maintain order and give protection to life and property. During the recent teamsters' and stevedores' strike many of our men were severely beaten and one was killed; the murderers were never detected, although our company offered a large reward. Through the development of harbor facilities in other neighboring ports the Association is no longer compelled to trust its property or the life or health of its employes to the mercies of so-called "ill-advised sympathizers" as it is not a difficult matter at present to move to some place where proper protection and ample accommodations can be obtained. Neither the Alaska Packers' Association as a corporation, nor myself as an individual, are opposed to labor unions. I fully recognize their great economic value in the development of our country. But many of them, especially in San Francisco, not appreciating their responsibilities, are given to over-reaching themselves in an excess of authority and the making of exorbitant demands in addition to, as above stated, breaking of any and all promises as their whims direct them. A liberal and consistent management of the unions would be of lasting benefit to themselves and our industries.

Not a word of the foregoing was printed in any of those great dailies that guide the destinies of this metropolis and that boast of their devotion to the welfare of the city and its people. This is one of many instances of the suppression of news by the agencies that are consecrated to its dissemination. Is it impossible for the interests that support the newspapers to realize the part that is played by a servile and traitorous press in stifling the industries of San Francisco?

The Breeders of Discontent

Mr. Frederick Beckholdt tells us in the columns of the Call that those picturesque propagandists of the gospel of discontent by whom Fresno was besieged are disciples of Emma Goldman, the "Priestess of Anarchy" as William Marion Reedy calls her. In a measure this is doubtless true. The gospel of discontent is the gospel of anarchy. But Emma Goldman is not the only preacher of this gospel. Hers is not a voice in the wilderness. Her preachings are far from peculiar. If to superficial observers they appear to be heterodox it is because Emma Goldman is the representative of a revolutionary propaganda whose principles are symbolized by a flag and embodied in certain maxims. In these maxims the ultimate purpose of the propaganda is clearly defined. They tell us that the object of anarchy is freedom—absolute freedom. They tell us that the social system under which we live enslaves the mind and body, that all government is violence, that conventions are despotic, that the rule of the majority is a tyranny; and they urge us to return to Nature and her veracities and integrities. All of this and a lot more logically akin to this, Emma Goldman, a very intelligent, apparently a very sincere visionary idealist, preaches with all the fervor of her soul, with all the eloquence of a consuming passion. And naturally she preaches the gospel of discontent; for if the masses are to remain content with their miserable lot then what hope is there for anarchy? But, as we have said, it is but in a measure true that the Industrial Workers of the World are disciples of Emma Goldman. Before becoming her disciples they were put in a receptive mood by a long course of instruction and suggestion in the incendiary school conducted by the editors of our sensational, mob-coddling press. The yellow journal of discontent prepared the disgruntled for enlistment beneath the red banner of anarchy. These nomadic fanatics of the I. W. W. now in a paroxysm of desperate protest against their lot, these heterogeneous souls struggling with inarticulate roar for some fantastic image of right, some alluring phantom of Utopian bliss, are converts to the mischievous propaganda of an unscrupulous press. Much more potent and insidious in its appeal to the spirit of discontent than Emma Goldman's is the appeal of the innumerable incendiaries of the tripod by whom class hatred is propagated, the unfortunate irritated, the lowly exasperated and all fed with the poison-fruits from the upas trees of journalism. Compare the faint soprano of frail Emma Goldman with the calliopean chorus of Mr. Hearst and all his lusty imitators, and then consider how absurd it is to attribute to the talented little Jewess the movement that betokens the effectiveness of persistent whinings against special privileges and the power of wealth. Who is it that has worked up impatience of our system of government to that pitch where conviction becomes a passion? Surely it is not Emma Goldman, the much-abused anarchist, who has been repeatedly thrown into jail and denied a hearing. Long before Emma Goldman toured this country the newspapers were printing violent daubs and grotesque caricatures that purported to be faithful pictures of the evils of the times. Long before Emma Goldman faced her first American audience the readers of American newspapers of general circulation were made impatient of the existing form of government. As though it were not enough to make them sensible of the dread power of the Plutocracy which bestrode the nation like a giant spectre of the Brocken, they were goaded to a frenzy even after that power was subdued and tamed by the means at hand under the time-honored institutions of government; and even now they are being urged to destroy those very institutions which enabled them to get relief. The progagation of distrust and discontent goes steadily on. What have we that is more conducive to the melancholy of one engaged in the struggle for existence than the typical American newspaper with its dolorous wailings against the usurpation of the people's rights and its hypocritical expressions of pity for the downtrodden masses? It really makes the air sultry with a feeling of oppression, and one may readily understand how the soul of the average reader in its recoil from the gloom and sorrow that darkens and sobs around it comes to fancy that it has fallen upon evil times and that there is much reason for hate and resentment.

Emma's Accomplice

It is one of the curious anomalies of our times that there should be so much prejudice as there appears to be against Emma Goldman and persons who are regarded as her disciples and so little against the newspapers. This anomaly is due of course to a misconception. The newspapers profess to be devoted to the public welfare, and they are believed, and they are supported by men who are luxuriously housed up, and who live sumptuously on the marrow of the earth, and who have nothing but scorn for such miserable fanatics as have infested the town of Fresno. Your prosperous merchant who advertises his wares in the incendiary press pities the poor wretch who is not satisfied with just enough to keep body and soul together and who protests frantically against the whole social system. His pity is not so much for the misery that the poor wretch endures as for his ignorance. Your prosperous merchant prides himself on his intelligence, and yet he is unconsciously contributing every day to the support of the propaganda which swells the ranks of the discontented. He is really a most irrational and obtuse person, is this prosperous merchant. He hates anarchists who are frank enough to make confession of their faith, and all the while he promotes the interests of the poisoners of public opinion who are sapping the foundations of the government which they profess to love. Indirectly your prosperous merchant is more responsible than Emma Goldman for the discontent that breeds anarchy. And if it be a crime to breed discontent your prosperous merchant is a far worse offender than the Priestess of Anarchy; for his motives are sordid, hers are disinterested; the merchant's only purpose is to sell his goods; Emma Goldman's purpose is to improve the condition of God's creatures. And while Emma Goldman may be a dangerous dreamer, your prosperous merchant is certainly a practical man. If Emma Goldman were publishing the Daily Anarchist and it had a circulation as large as one of the Hearst papers your prosperous merchant would contribute to the cause just as he contributes to the prosperity of the Examiner.

Hearst and Goldman

The difference between a Goldman and a Hearst is but a difference of routes to the same end—the undermining of government. But whereas Emma Goldman is an idealist who advocates the destruction of all government in the interest of the individual whose welfare she has at heart, William R. Hearst is a materialist who, affecting a love of the masses and seducing them by flattery urges them for his own aggrandizement to put themselves more completely under the sway of the press by destroying the institutions that were contrived for their protection. The philosophy of Hearst is the philosophy that led to the French Revolution when there was real oppression and injustice to provoke stern resentment. Surely the philosophy of Emma Goldman can lead to nothing worse. As a matter of fact the Goldman philosophy is the more humane of the two. For the Goldman philosophy is concerned for the freedom of the individual, for what all philosophers agree to be the best government, that which governs the least, that which most liberally lets its citizens alone. Long before Emma Goldman's time the question was seriously propounded, whether civilization is on the whole good or evil. Emma Goldman answers that the civilization which we know, which stands for human improvement in general, but which produces far more misery than savages know, is chiefly evil. She would therefore have everybody work out his own salvation and the devil take the hindmost. The only flaw in her philosophy is that it solves not the problem that it raises. The anarchist knows only that to improve on the present system in accordance with his views you must first destroy it, and there is much to be said in support of the proposition, especially from the standpoint of those who enjoy none of the benefits of civilization. Now let us consider the Hearst philosophy, the philosophy of absolute democracy. This means the liberty of being oppressed by our fellowmen. It means that all questions should be left to the collective folly of the nation. It means the sacrifice of some portion of individual will for a common purpose, and that the common purpose shall be dictated by the multitude which must always have its judgment formed by a few favored ones having direct communication with the public ear. To what little extent we have gone in the practice of democracy we see that instead of guaranteeing our liberties it absorbs them, and Mr. Hearst would have us go a great deal further, and obviously the inevitable consequence of the course which he urges must be either anarchy or a swift, complete change of government. A democracy such as we appear to be drifting into is quite as impracticable at present as the individualistic state of civilization that Emma Goldman dreams of. The masses will be prepared for complete control of the government when they learn that the value of everything is not estimated in money and that co-operation in society to be successful must be precisely what it is on shipboard. In other words habits of discipline must be cultivated before there can be rational co-operation. And the masses will not submit to discipline while they are having fostered for them the fond delusion that all men are equal. Not to admit that by reason of our inherent inequality of strength and capacity whole classes of men must contribute to the glory and achievements of others is to ignore the obvious phenomena of human nature, the inscrutable ways of Providence; and if we thus ignore the obvious it is but to make confusion worse confounded the more we approximate a complete democracy. So the newspapers that are urging us on to a complete democracy are certainly striving quite as hard as Emma Goldman to disturb the social order. And manifestly they are much more deserving of reprobation than the Industrial Workers of the World who have real grievances to actuate them, and who, for giving utterance to those grievances, the very same that a free press incessantly expatiates upon, are thrown into jail by the servants of a democracy.

Perspective Impressions

Senator Bailey's resignation was at the end of a hawser.

The claptrappers of the Legislature have censured the Senate of the United States for its action in the Lorimer case. And most of them voted for Works for conscience sake—and Meyer Lissner.

The Assembly killed the bill prohibiting the publication in newspapers of the "before and after" pictures so dear to the hearts of quack medical advertisers. Was this done in the interest of art or in deference to the wishes of reform editors?

There is one thing to be said for the recall—it will enable the people to get a new governor.

The Congress that failed to enact the Ocean Mail Subsidy also failed to abolish the subsidy enjoyed by the yellow magazines. Both failures are masterpieces of Progressive statesmanship.

Bishop Hughes tells the Methodists of San Jose that men stay away from church because the ministers preach to the women. But don't a lot of the ministers preach to the yellow journals? The men can get salvation at the Monday breakfast table.

Some men confound the woman's suffrage propaganda with the W. C. T. U. and hence the cause has a considerable handicap to overcome.

Our wonderful Assembly has passed a bill making it a misdemeanor for a bank to be so undignified as to hold the stakes for a prize-fight. Oh for a bill making it a felony for a Legislature to commit the unpardonable sin of asininity.

Professor Charles Mills Gayley of Berkeley has taken occasion to dissent from George Bernard Shaw on the philosophy of morals. The probability is that when Shaw hears about it he will ask, Who in hell is Gayley?

The Bar Room Alms

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: A short time ago I wrote to warn your readers, out of an unhappy personal experience, about the ways that are dark and the tricks that are vain of the taxicab chauffeur who makes life gay by flipping the taximeter. While in New York I made the acquaintance of another graft and as it is just possible that it flourishes here I pen these few words of warning. The warning is addressed to those men who use our saloons and it is simply this: Look out for the fraudulent alms-seeker. Men who frequent bar rooms are used to being interrupted in their potations and conversations by the rattle of the tambourine and the soft voice of the Salvation Army lassie and with most it has become a habit to yield the price of a cocktail to the cause of charity. And well they may, say I. But this is where the warning comes in. It has been discovered in New York that any number of women make their living by passing themselves off as members of the Salvation Army, the Volunteers of America or of Catholic sisterhoods. A lot of them have been warned and their graft exposed. How is one to know the false from the true alms-seeker? Very easily. Catholic sisters are never sent to saloons and all Salvation Army women and Volunteers of America are supposed to have cards. If in doubt ask for the card. This is not a big matter at first sight, but it has an important principle behind it. Charity should be kept clean. The man who discovers that he has been duped in the name of charity is apt to grow suspicious of all alms-seekers and repulse the good and the bad indiscriminately. It is therefore important that he should not be duped. And he is more apt to be duped in a bar room than anywhere else.

Very sincerely,

—A Returned Traveler.

That Fair Site

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Will you kindly allow me space to thank your correspondent, Mr. R. S. Ammen, for calling attention to Lincoln Park and vicinity as affording ideal requisites for our Fair site. Your correspondent's signature, alone, should be taken as the last word on the subject!

Some weeks ago I myself suggested this same site, in a letter to the daily papers, which however, did not appear until this morning's issue of the "Examiner." Unfortunately this site cannot look for help from any "boosting interests." It must stand or fall on its own merits alone. Will you not continue to help it along?

I would like to moot one other point for consideration in regard to the "Fair site": This site, it is true, must be within the bounds of the City and County of San Francisco, but, all the same, I think the fair grounds should, in common courtesy, be placed as conveniently as possible for Greater San Francisco. If Lake Merced site is selected it would mean a curtailment of "gate receipts," especially for night events, even from San Franciscans; and, for Greater San Franciscans to be present at night events, this site would, for the great majority, be absolutely prohibitive. On the other hand if we fix upon "Bay View" as the place, San Francisco, I think, would be too generous, for Oakland would get the lion's share of patronage. Her citizens and visitors would ply back and forth without so much as touching San Francisco, outside the fair grounds.

Looking to the greater benefit to the greatest number, common convenience and common fairness, I think the several suggested fair sites stand in order of merit as follows: The Ferry site, Lincoln Park, Harbor View, Lake Merced, Bay View, and last of all, as injurious to the interests of all San Franciscans as well as our visitors, comes Golden Gate Park.

XII—REVEREND JOSEPH McQUAIDE

By Edward F. O'Day

Having considered the matter carefully and conservatively, instituting conscientious comparisons and candidly conceding the dire consequences of getting in wrong with the rest of the clergy, I am willing to venture the assertion that Father Joe McQuaide is today the most popular priest in San Francisco. It did not need Father McQuaide's splendid services in Washington to make him popular with all who knew him, a multitudinous number; but the trip to Washington with the rest of the fair delegation, the acquaintances established and the friendships renewed in the course of that hot campaign and the cordial intercourse with the representatives of all factions, classes and ranks during the recent celebration of the victory have raised him to a pinnacle of popularity the like of which only one other San Francisco priest ever attained. This popularity is natural. For years Father McQuaide has been in our midst, performing his priestly offices and appearing in public on appropriate occasions. Year after year he has been widening his circle of friends and enlarging his influence for good. His service as a chaplain in the Philippines is known to everybody. But suddenly the spotlight is turned upon him. He goes to Washington, meets the president as an old pal and does as much as any other individual to give San Francisco the fair. It is the psychological moment; he is hoisted to the shoulders of good opinion and huzzaed enthusiastically by the general. Presto! he has become a popular idol.

It is a difficult role to fill. The man who tries to live up to the crowd's conception of his heroism is foredoomed to failure. But Father McQuaide, I am quite sure, will attempt nothing of the sort. It is rarely indeed that a smile is not playing on his serio-comic face and that a twinkle is not gleaming in his blue eyes. In the habitual drollery of his expression is the best evidence that he is not taking his honors too seriously, which is a very good reason for believing that his popularity is going to wear well.

When Father McQuaide was a young man people had a way of trying to shape his career for him. This fact is illuminating. When influential people bother their busy heads about a youngster's future they do so out of an abounding confidence in his ability. But Father McQuaide did not follow any of the paths marked out for him by others. He followed that mystical light which Catholic theology refers to reverently as a vocation for the priesthood. But the efforts of others to mold his fortunes make an interesting episode in his life story.

Father McQuaide was six months old when his parents decided to forsake Boston and make their home in San Francisco. That was forty-two years ago when people came to California by the Isthmus of Panama. The McQuaides crossed the isthmus in a coach and when, as a result of careless driving over a dangerous road, the coach lurched heavily, the future Father McQuaide was torn from his mother's arms and fell into a ditch. Everybody but his mother thought he was dead, but the maternal instinct was sure and the baby was finally revived. On account of this incident Father McQuaide feels that he has a more than ordinary interest in the Panama Canal.

Young McQuaide learned the three R's in the old Garfield Primary and then attended the famous old Washington Grammar where he got the only licking of his life from Joe O'Connor (whose whiskers, I believe, were as luxuriant then as they are now) and where he played marbles and mumblety-peg with Dr. Rethers, W. H. Metson, Tom Boyle, Judge Dunne and Eugene Schmitz. When his father died and his mother needed his assistance, he felt like a man of mature years and weighty responsibilities. He left school and obtained a position in the Franco-American Bank. There he met two men who tried to influence his career. George C. Perkins was the president of that bank and A. Comte Jr. was the manager. Although solvent it went out of business, through no fault in the financial methods of young McQuaide, and Comte was eager to take the boy into his law office. But McQuaide thought it over, decided that he didn't want to be a lawyer, and went to Sacred Heart College. At this time he was carrying a newspaper route for the Bulletin and by his bright manner and habitual good humor attracted the attention of George Barnes, one of the great newspapermen of the day. Barnes decided that he would make a newspaperman of Joe and got him a place on the joint staff of the Call and Bulletin, at that time under the Fitch and Pickering regime. Father McQuaide says that the proudest day of his young life was when he saw his first newspaper story in type. But despite Barnes' efforts Father McQuaide did not stay with the newspaper game. Having graduated from Sacred Heart he went to St. Ignatius for a year and then took his bachelor and master degrees at Santa Clara. His inclination toward the priesthood was developed by the Jersuit training, so he went to St. Mary's, Baltimore, and after four years of theology was ordained by Cardinal Gibbons.

When he returned to this diocese in 1892 the archbishop sent him to San Rafael with the prison at San Quentin as part of his charge. The long-termers still talk affectionately of Father Joe and are delighted to see him when he pays them an occasional visit. From San Rafael he came to Holy Cross parish in this city and had ministered there for five years when the Spanish-American war broke out. Senator Perkins, his old friend of the Franco-American Bank, had previously tried to induce him to accept a naval chaplaincy, but after consultation with the archbishop he rejected the offer. It was probably just as well that he did, for if he had accepted he would have been chaplain on the Maine at the time of its blowing-up. But an army chaplaincy he did accept and when Father McKinnon was transferred to the Filipino schools Father McQuaide was the only Catholic chaplain in the Eighth Army corps which included the First California regiment. It was strenuous work and heroic, as those officers will tell you who saw Father McQuaide in the smallpox hospital. Down in the islands he made the acquaintance of Governor-General Taft and they were soon on terms of affectionate friendliness, a relation which has endured to this day. He rendered Mr. Taft a great deal of assistance in the church land litigation and when Taft as secretary of war needed an envoy to untangle certain difficulties between Governor-General Smith and the Archbishop of Manila he sent Father McQuaide back to the Philippines.

This experience in diplomatic wire-pulling stood Father McQuaide in good stead when Archbishop Riordan selected him to make the fight in California for exemption of all church property from taxation. After a six months' campaign the constitutional amendment providing for that exemption was passed by a majority of 14,000, a result which seems to show that Father McQuaide is a good politician. He is.

But first of all he is a successful priest. When the new parish of the Holy Redeemer was created out in Eureka Valley he was made rector and administered its religions and business affairs with such conspicuous ability that when old Father Lagan died the archbishop rewarded him by giving him the fine parish of Sacred Heart. And maybe Father McQuaide isn't proud of Sacred Heart parish! of the big church which he finished and afterwards enlarged, of the stained glass windows and the $20,000 Carrara marble altars, of the priest's house and of the Sacred Heart College in Fell street, the first school erected after the fire! Father McQuaide may be a popular hero. He may be able to lunch with the President at the White House and help arrange a little matter like the vote of Congress in the world's fair contest. But these are only passing activities. His whole heart and soul are wrapped up in the 2,000 Catholic families which constitute Sacred Heart Parish and every one of those two thousand families thinks he's the greatest rector in San Francisco. With a start like that is it any wonder that he has become our most popular priest?

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over

By Robert McTavish

Conscripts for the Kitchen

Compulsory domestic service for girls and women as an equivalent to the universal military service incumbent upon men is a novel proposal put forward by a leading German feminist. The writer points out that compulsory military training has contributed enormously both to the mental and physical development of German manhood, and declares that similar benefits would be inevitable if the women subjects of the Kaiser were compelled to undergo the training for which nature best fits them. She explains that it could be enforced without burdening the national budget, and that it is men who would benefit most from the system because the State would thus assure them competent and experienced housewives. The writer thinks the marriage institution would also become more popular if men knew they could select wives who had done service with the "colors" in kitchen, laundry, nursery and sewing-room. "When it became necessary through the stress of war," concludes the writer, "to introduce compulsory military service there were many protests against such a 'limitation of personal liberty,' but Germans have lived to appreciate the incomparable blessings of male conscription. Would it be otherwise in the case of girls and women? There might be less of the craze for higher education for women, but fewer girls of our lower classes would be compelled to enter industrial occupations."

The picturesque farmer of the Middle West may be extinct in another generation. A Kansas agricultural college has started a class of etiquette. Sword swallowing, the balancing of peas on a knife, the audible consumption of soup and the drinking of tea from a saucer are among the rustic joys of which rising hayseeds are to be henceforth deprived.

Nevada's Very Latest Reform

Condemned men in the State of Nevada will have the choice of death by hanging or poison if the bill presented to the Legislature by the Code Commission becomes law. Hydrocyanic acid is the poison mentioned, and one drop on the end of the tongue will produce instant death. The proposed law says that the judge at the time of pronouncing sentence shall allow a defendant to designate which method of death he desires. If the defendant elects voluntarily to take hydrocyanic acid, he shall be provided, at least ten minutes before the time for carrying out the death sentence, by the prison physician, by order of the warden, with a sufficient quantity to cause instantaneous death. The physician shall explain to him the proper method, and the following shall be written on the bottle: "There is contained herein a sufficient quantity of hydrocyanic acid to cause instantaneous death. You are authorized to take the same for the purpose of carrying into execution the sentence of death heretofore legally pronounced against you." Should the prisoner fail to take the poison, then it is specified that he shall be hanged forthwith.

San Berdoo is considering the advisability of reforming Chantecler. Owing to complaints from nervous citizens the city council is framing an ordinance making it unlawful for a cock to crow within the city limits. Here is a reform which the Legislature overlooked.

French Motor Obligations

A point of considerable importance for Americans who make extended motoring trips on the Continent is to be aware of the extent of their legal liability, not only in the case of persons whom they may injure on the road but also of persons they may have with them. The recent judgment of a Paris court throws a curious light on this subject. A chauffeur using his master's car asked one of his friends to make a trip with him. There was an accident and the friend was injured. He forthwith brought action against the chauffeur as well as against the chauffeur's master, recovering a very considerable sum in damages. Foreign motorists in France are interested in this judgment in two ways. If they are riding in a car belonging to a motor company, they can hold the driver and the company responsible for any damage they may suffer. If, on the other hand, they have invited a friend to take a seat beside them in their own car, they are under legal obligation to indemnify him should there be any accident in which he is injured.

A Chance for Hays Hammond

Russia has countless millions of gold in her vast territories, but there is no way of getting it out of the ground. A report has just been made for the guidance of the Russian ministry in its future policy in regard to the gold production of the empire, but, like so many reports of the present day, it conveys the impression that Russia up to date has lacked the supervision of the practical business man—has been ruled by the bureaucrat instead of the administrator. What has been done either is insufficient or in the wrong direction; what is needed to produce practical results has been left entirely undone. Thus the enormous tracts of land owned by the emperor as "cabinet territories" produce the insignificant amount of $100,000 or $150,000 gold per annum, while three and four times that amount either is known or suspected to pass over the Chinese frontier by various contraband routes. The report points out that, although in the last twenty years Russia has increased her production of gold by 50 per cent, this is nothing in comparison with the increase in other parts of the world. For the same period the world's gold production has more than trebled. The reasons are found for this backwardness of Russia in the following: Russia lacks roads and railways, and cannot get at her gold with the facility necessary; she is hampered by legislative and administrative orders that put serious obstacles in the way of private ventures, and she has not the superabundant capital required to place the industry of gold-getting on a satisfactory footing to compete with other gold fields the world over. But she need not despair. John Hays Hammond has looked her over recently and where Hammond goes, capital and enterprise usually follow.

Railways in Turkey

The Turkish empire is about to embark in great railway development. More than 4000 miles of road have already been built, and lines are planned which will eventually connect Constantinople with Mecca and Medina, open up the rich plains of Asia Minor, and, going down to Bagdad, make the valley of the Euphrates equal as a wealth producer to the valley of the Nile. The resources to be developed by these new roads are enormous. They include the coal fields of the Black sea and mineral lands which have not yet been prospected. Asia Minor is rich agriculturally. The plains of Mesopotamia will raise anything that can be grown in Egypt, and the new irrigation schemes will make them as productive as they were when Nebuchadnezzar was reigning at Babylon. In ancient times that country had a population of over 6,000,000. It has not one-fourth as many today. Cotton will grow not only there, but also throughout Asia Minor, and it may be that one of the chief competitors of our Southern plantations will eventually be found in this now almost waste but exceedingly rich part of the world.

The elevation of a plumber to the dignity of life membership in the Prussian House of Lords will give the professional humorists an opportunity to speculate on the size of the plumbing bill which the Kaiser took this means of compromising.

Mutato Nomine, de Te

"While a few courageous men have been able to defeat the initiative and the recall, the demagogues of Kansas should not be downcast," says the Kansas City Journal. "Possibly they can succeed with the next legislature. If the initiative once becomes a law in Kansas, a good husky demagogue, especially if he has plenty of money to work with, can accomplish almost anything he pleases for himself. For example, get 5 per cent of the voters to petition for the reduction of railroad passenger rates to 1 cent a mile, and put the measure into the constitution. There will not be the slightest difficulty in getting the petitions. You can get 5 per cent of the voters to sign almost any old petition—especially if you have plenty of money to work with. When a measure of this sort is once put into a campaign, see what a magnificent battle cry you have. ONE MILE, ONE CENT! This battle cry alone will carry the measure. The question of railroad rates is so intricate and complicated, and so far outside the common experience and knowledge, that an argument can be put up for almost any sort of a rate measure."

Who would have thought, a few years ago, that a Kansas editorial could be applied word for word to California conditions!

Pears' SOAP

15c. a Cake for the Unscented

Back to the Spade

By Luigi Pirandello (From the Italian)

All night long it had rained in torrents; such a downpour that the house itself seemed bound to be swept away. Old Siroli, who for more than a month had looked as though he were dazed by his unforeseen calamity and had ceased to sleep at night, was at last aroused by the driving violence of the storm, and said to his wife, sleepless and heavy hearted like himself:

"Tomorrow, if God wills it, we will break ground."

And now, since daybreak, the three sons of the old man, wasted and sallow from malarial fever, were plying their spades in line with two other peasants hired by the day. From time to time, first one and then the other would straighten up his bent form, his face contracted with the pain of his aching loins, and would wipe his eyes on a big handkerchief of flowered cotton.

"Cheer up!" the two hired men would say. "It is not a matter of life and death, after all."

But the other would shake his head, and then would spit upon his callous, earth-stained hands and resume his spading. From the thick undergrowth on the wooded hillside there came from time to time a sort of wrathful wail. The old man, stalwart yet, was pruning away the undergrowth, performing his weary task to the accompaniment of his lamentations.

The country, infested in the summer time with malaria, seemed at last to breathe freely, thanks to the previous night's abundant rain, which had 'raised the tide' down in the ravine. After so many months of drought, one could really hear the Drago rushing along with joyous gurgling.

For upward of forty years, Siroli had held the tenancy of these lands of Sant' Anna. Many seasons had already passed since he and his wife had succeeded in conquering the fever, in rendering themselves immune. In the course of years, God willing, the three sons who now suffered from it, would in their turn acquire immunity. Three other children, however, two boys and a girl, had died of it, and dead also was the wife of the oldest son, leaving behind her one little daughter of five, who seemed likely to succumb in her turn to the attacks of the disease.

"God is the Master," the old man was wont to say, closing his eyes. "If he wants her for himself, let him take her. He has placed us here; and here we must toil and suffer."

He was so blindly trusting in his faith that he habitually resigned himself to all the hardest blows of fortune, accepting them as the will of God. Nothing less than the catastrophe which had now befallen could have so utterly crushed and overwhelmed him.

Notwithstanding the need of many arms in the fields, he had desired to make a gift to God of one of his sons. It was the dream of many a peasant to have a son in the priesthood; and he had succeeded in realizing that dream, not for self-glory but solely to have merit in the sight of God. By means of economies and privations of all kinds, he had year after year maintained his boy at the seminary in the neighboring city; and at last had had the consolation of seeing him ordained priest, and of hearing him say his first mass.

The memory of that first mass had remained indelibly fixed in the old man's mind. He had personally felt the presence of God in the church, that day. And it seemed to him that he could still see his son, robed for the solemnity in that splendid vestment embroidered in gold, moving softly, pale and trembling before the altar, in front of the tabernacle; could still see him bowing the knee and joining spotless hands in sign of prayer; opening them again, and turning with closed eyes towards the faithful, to murmur the words of the ritual, and then turn back to the missal upon the reading-desk. Never before had the mystery of the mass seemed so solemn. With soul almost severed from his senses, the old man had followed it through, tremulously, his throat contracting in a most delicious anguish; by his side he had heard his wife, his saintly old wife, weeping with emotion; and he himself began to weep, too, involuntarily, irrestrainably, bowing himself until his forehead touched the ground, at the tinkle of the little bell, at the supreme moment of the elevation.

From that day on, despite his years and knowledge and worldly experience, the old man had felt himself almost a child in the presence of his son, the priest. What value could his whole blameless life, spent in misery and toil, possess, as compared with the purity of his son who stood so close to God? And he fell into the habit of speaking of him as of a saint, of listening to him in open-mouthed adoration, whenever he came out to the farm to see him, from the College of Oblates, in which he had won an appointment as preceptor, by his zeal and learning. The other sons, destined to the toil of the fields, and exposed there to the danger of death, had not in the least envied the lot of their brother, but on the contrary had shown themselves proud of him, the priest, the glory of their family. Sick as they were, they many a time found consolation in the thought that it was Giovanni who offered prayers for them.

The news that he had disgraced himself by appropriating some money entrusted to him for the orphan asylum had fallen with the crushing force of a thunderbolt upon the rustic roof of old Siroli. The mother, at first, in her patriarchal sanctity, had not even been able to form an idea of the deed committed by her son. The old father had to explain to her as best he could, and she had been overcome with horrible bewilderment:

"Giovanni! What are you telling me!"

Siroli went at once to the city, to obtain more accurate details, and with the secret hope that it was a case of calumny. He had applied to several acquaintances, and at sight of him they had all shown embarrassment, almost repulsion; they had answered him shortly, in monosyllables, and with averted eyes. He even ventured to go to see Lobruno, who was master of the lands of which he was tenant. Lobruno, clever politician and city official, friendly with everyone from bishop to prefect, received him harshly, with an explosion of wrath:

"A fine state of affairs! A fine state of affairs! Make him a priest, would you? From ditch-digger to priest. * * * Satisfied now, are you? That is the fruit of your mania for climbing, at any cost, without preparation, without the necessary education!"

Then, becoming somewhat calmer, he had promised to use his influence to silence the scandal.

"For the credit of his cloth, you understand! For the respect that we all owe to holy religion, you understand!"

The poor old man returned to his friends, like a beaten dog, not retaining a single syllable of all that had been said to him, but certain of one thing only, that the charge against his son was true, really true; that Giovanni, in his infamy, had fled, disappeared from the city, hiding from the wrath of the people; and that under the weight of the ignominy he himself would never again have peace, nor the courage to raise his eyes to look any one in the face.

And now, clambering up among the trees, he was pruning away the undergrowth. No one could see him there, and as he labored he was free to weep. Until now, he had not shed a tear; from that day to this. He looked back over his own undaunted life, and that of the aged woman who had shared it, and he failed to understand how such a monster could ever have been born to them, how he himself could ever have been deceived through all these years, to the point of thinking him a saint. And he had meant to make a gift of him to God, and on his account had sacrificed the other sons, the good, dutiful pious sons, who were now tilling the ground yonder, not yet quite recovered from their last attack of fever. Ah, God could never, never forgive, after being so foully offended. The malediction of God would rest forever upon their house. The justice of men would overtake the miserable wretch, and drag him from his lurking-place, where he had gone to hide his hideous shame; and he himself and his wife would die of mortification, knowing that their son was in the galleys.

All at once there came to the old man, absorbed as he was in these bitter reflections, the voice of one of his sons, Carmine, who was the oldest:

"Oh, father! Come here! He has come back!"

Siroli started violently, grasped the trunk of a tree to hold himself upright, and began to tremble from head to foot. Giovanni? Come back? And what was he doing here? And how had he dared to set foot again in his father's house, to raise his eyes again to his mother's face?

"Go!" he cried in reply, the branch of the tree shaking with his wrath, "Go, tell him to begone, at once! I won't have him in the house! I won't have him!"

Carmine exchanged glances with the other brothers, as if to ask advice, and then proceeded towards the rustic cottage, making a sign to his orphaned niece, jubilant over the arrival of her uncle the priest, that she was to go inside.

In the courtyard, Carmine found one of Lobruno's overseers, sitting on the low wall beside the door. Evidently he and the priest had come together.

"Where is your father?" asked the officer of Carmine, lifting his head and raising up a light stick he held in his hand and with which, while waiting, he had been lashing a small shoot that grew between the paving stones of the court.

"He says he won't see him," replied Carmine. "He won't have him in the house. I was sent to tell him so."

"Hold on," returned the officer. "Go back and tell your father that I have something to say to him in the name of the landlord. Go along, now!"

Carmine spread out his arms and turned back. Presently he returned, accompanied by his two brothers.

"He is on his way," he told the overseer, and followed his brothers into the big ground-floor room, damp, smoky, dark with soot. In one

The Sun Critic on Joe Redding

Here in San Francisco we know Joe Redding as a man of divers accomplishments, a wit, a musician, a composer of music and a turner of graceful postprandial phrases. Among our dilettanti he occupies an honored position. But in New York they have been judging our Joe by a single achievement and the judgment has been severe and uncomplimentary. I refer to the critical onslaughts which have been made on "Natoma," the opera on which Redding and Victor Herbert collaborated and in which Mary Garden sang the title role. From the telegraphic despatches one was permitted to glean that the opera was not an overwhelming success; in fact, through the guarded phrases there peeped the evidence of that horrid damnation by faint praise which is the death of encouragement. Suspicions engendered by reading what the correspondents of our local papers had to say are confirmed by perusal of the New York papers for the morning following the debut of "Natoma" at the Metropolitan Opera House. The musical critic of the Sun devoted three columns of carefully considered criticism to the opera. Mr. Redding's libretto naturally came in for a good deal of remark and the remark was far from flattering. The Sun critic showed no tenderness for our Joe's feelings.

"A Hack Horse to Carry Music"

"The failure of the opera to reach the level of success," said the Sun critic, "is due in no inconsiderable measure to the libretto. Those who have ardently advocated the performance of opera in English will not find their cause aided by this specimen of the dramatist's art. The story is by no means incapable of effective development, but this has not been accomplished by Mr. Redding. Unquestionably his aim was to make a mere opera book, a hack horse to carry a load of precious music; but he has failed even in that. His first act is long, cumbersome, prolix and tiresome. His second is padded, feeble and dramatically almost ludicrous. His third has some merit, because its content is centred on few ideas and its action is direct and simple." But this is not all. Again the Sun critic returns to the charge in these words: "The awkward construction of this book must be apparent. The first act is crowded with incidents. The second is nothing but empty spectacle till its one incident takes place. The third is compact and well centred upon a single thought, and the musician here has an opportunity to compose something continuous and symmetrical. It is not important that extended comment should be made on the text. It is generally quite hopeless. It has neither literary nor musical quality. It is neither poetic nor dramatic. The dialogue is written in prose, which oscillates uncertainly between stilted bombast and the baldest colloquialism, but never once reaches simple dignity. The lyrics are of the type long ago discarded by the 'readers' given to children in primary schools." All of which need not discourage Mr. Redding or the friends in this city who believe in him. Greater librettists than he failed in their earlier attempts. It is by failure frequently that the writer "finds himself."

The Case of Sir Hector Macdonald

In the Call last Sunday was printed as though it were news the story that Sir Hector Macdonald who is popularly supposed to be turning to clay in a grave in Scotland is still alive and at present engaged in fashioning an army for China. This story was first printed in these columns about a year ago. The Call's story emanated from the passengers of a Pacific liner which came into port last Saturday. They heard the story in China. The story which appeared in these columns was told by an Englishman who knew Sir Hector Masdonald, and who saw a man whom he identified as the heroic soldier on the parade ground in Pekin. According to his story he spoke to Macdonald, addressing him by name, and the man turned on his heel and went away.

Historical Parallels

There are many people who believe that Macdonald lives. And doubtless in a great measure this is a case of the wish being father to the belief. History supplies many examples of this sort of scepticism. At this moment the Government of France is investigating the case of a man who claims descent from the Dauphin whose death history tells us occurred in the Temple where the family of Louis XVI was imprisoned. That the young Prince did not die as reported was a belief cherished in France for many years. The plain people of Rome refused to believe that their idol, the esthetic Nero, was dead. To this day there are people who fondly indulge the belief that Napoleon escaped from St. Helena about the time that his death was reported and that he came to this country where he lived to a ripe old age. There is a story about Aaron Burr's daughter, Theodosia, that she was not made to "walk the plank" but was taken to the West Indies by a pirate chief who compelled her to be his mistress, and that she was seen years afterwards in New Orleans in a state of poverty and shame. Many of Oscar Wilde's admirers, who hated to think that so brilliant a man came to so mournful an end, eagerly gave ear to the story that when he disappeared from his haunts in Paris it was to enter a monastery in Spain where he was writing poetry years after his funeral.

Plausibility of the Story

The story that Sir Hector Macdonald is still alive is not implausible. When he arrived in Paris he was believed to be on his way to London to stand trial on a charge similar to the one that was recently made against Admiral Barry. Now it is most improbable that the British Government ever purposed ventilating so terrible a scandal. They don't do that sort of thing in England. The practice there is to suppress scandal. It is known that the Government took a hand in the Wilde case, and offered to smuggle that great literary artist out of England at the very moment that disgrace was about to overwhelm him, and that he refused to go. How unlikely then that the Government should order the gallant Macdonald home to become the central figure in a vulgar scandal that would humiliate the whole army! How much more likely that the Government should take precautions against so painful a blow to the nation's pride! It would have been easy to arrange the matter in the very manner in which it is said to have been handled. It is not difficult to supply a corpse for an emergency. It would be difficult to carry out the deception in the case of a man so prominent as Sir Hector Macdonald if a funeral were held. But in his case there was no funeral, a circumstance in itself giving color to the story now current. For the popular officer had not publicly suffered disgrace. Only a few officials knew why he had been suspended. He was mourned by the people of his native town and they were prepared to make a great demonstration on the arrival of the body, but the body was rushed into town before dawn, and it was beneath the sod before the people learned that it had arrived.

Wifey—We've been married four weeks today.

Hubby—Really, darling, we must celebrate it. I know, I'll go to the club tonight and let them envy me because I've got you.

Our Next Mayor

At present everybody is preoccupied with the World's Fair site question, but that will soon be disposed of and then the politicians will be getting busy in preparation for the primary election. The political pot will soon be humming again, and in a few months we shall be in the midst of a very important municipal campaign. For this year we are to elect a World's Fair mayor, the term of office having been extended from two to four years. So far the only aspirants for the honor who have made announcement of their aspirations are Mayor McCarthy and the Hon. Charles F. Curry. The Mayor has a pretty strong organization behind him, and of course he is confident of receiving the united support of organized labor. The ex-Secretary of State is reorganizing the machine that supported him in his gubernatorial campaign. According to rumor there are several other citizens who would like very much to succeed Mayor McCarthy, prominent among them being A. W. Scott of the Civic League, who distinguished himself as a Fair booster and who has the finest shock of curly hair in all the city. I hear that he stands ready to give his services to the people, but would like a little encouragement from the principal civic bodies and the leading business interests. Rumor also credits Postmaster Fisk with being inclined to take a hand in the contest. To do so he would have to resign his Federal office, and this I hear he is being urged to do by many prominent citizens who believe that he is the one man behind whom all the people who have the best interests of the city at heart and who feel that we have had quite enough of the kind of government that P. H. McCarthy is giving us will unite with enthusiasm.

But it seems hardly probable that Fisk can be induced to withdraw from the Federal service which holds for him exceptionally fine promise. There is no man in California who enjoys to the extent that he does the confidence of the Administration at Washington.

The Return of Gertrude Elliott

At the end of the second act of "The Dawn of a To-morrow" the first night audience at the Savoy gave Gertrude Elliott a splendid welcome home. None but that overworked word "ovation" adequately describes the applause. She had been given an enthusiastic and whole-hearted reception when she made her first rather startling appearance in the second scene of the first act. In that scene the old baronet takes a pistol from his pocket and "Glad," the part Miss Elliott plays, suddenly emerges from a heap of rags and confronts him. There was a lot of handclapping when the audience recognized her well known features but it was as nothing compared to the noisy demonstration at the fall of the second curtain. Ten times the curtain went up and down and it was only by repeated shaking of her head that Miss Elliott smilingly conveyed the intelligence that she would not or could not make a speech. That is the sort of a homecoming that warms the cockles of the heart, the kind of reception which has made San Francisco particularly beloved by Californians who return after many years in fear and trepidation lest they fail to make good. San Francisco is independent in its judgment of actors, independent of its own critics and of the critics of the rest of the world; but it is always warm in its welcome of an old friend or townsman and places no obstacle of cold aloofness or frigid dignity in the way of his success. San Francisco is glad to see Gertrude Elliott again; glad to know that it can indorse the verdict pronounced upon her in London; and delighted to add her name to the imposing list of Californians who have "come back."

The McDermott Girls of Oakland

Naturally the return of Gertrude Elliott has loosened the tongues and brightened the memories of the old-timers and they are talking a great deal about the good old days when the two McDermott girls lived in Oakland. Jessie McDermott, now Maxine Elliott and Gertrude McDermott, now Gertrude Elliott on the stage and Mrs. Forbes Robertson in private life, were the daughters of a retired sea captain from Maine. They attended Snell's Seminary. One day there was quite a hubbub in their circle of friends, for Jessie, beautiful dark-eyed Junoesque Jessie, ran away and married her cousin who was a ball-player. The couple went to New York and their lines fell in unpleasant places. Finally they separated, never to come together again. At first Jessie kept a boarding house in New York; then she drifted to the stage and obtained a small part at Daly's. The next thing we knew Jessie McDermott, now Maxine Elliott, was playing in the Frawley company at the Columbia and captivating all the johnnies by her wonderful beauty. It was at the Columbia that she first met Nat Goodwin who fell madly in love with her at first sight and never rested till he married her.

Gertrude's Gradual Rise

In the old days in Oakland Gertrude McDermott was deeply interested in amateur theatricals. The prominence which Maxine won, not by her acting but by her pulchritude, gave Gertrude her opportunity. The two sisters had always been exceptionally devoted to each other and that sisterly love, by the way, continues undiminished to this day. Maxine obtained for Gertrude a position in the Frawley company, though no great histrionic career was predicted for her. Still she attracted considerable attention when she appeared with her sister in Goodwin's company at the Columbia. But her sister overshadowed her. When she made her debut she cut little figure with the scribes, owing to Maxine's more dazzling charms. She was not tall and large like Maxine, nor so strikingly beautiful, but she was slenderly and girlishly attractive and possessed the chic which Maxine lacked. She first went to London with Maxine and Nat in the "When We Were Twenty-One" company and she made an instant hit. The Londoners who are more accustomed than we are to the large placid type of loveliness represented by Maxine, fell in love with the typical American type shown by the "little sister of Maxine," as she was popularly called. When Maxine and Nat left London Gertrude decided to remain and carve out a career for herself. She was successful beyond her wildest dreams. Sir Arthur Sullivan and other notables took her up and made much of her. Then she joined Forbes Robertson's company and under his admirable tuition her advance was rapid.

Her Happy Married Life

It was soon observed by the members of Forbes Robertson's company that the great actor took more than a professional interest in the clever American girl. It was noted too that the romantic attachment was reciprocated. Although Forbes Robertson was twenty-five years the senior of Gertrude Elliott nobody was greatly surprised when their marriage took place. He is a man of great personal fascination and is regarded as one of the greatest of stage lovers, having played Romeo with distinction to the Juliet of Mary Anderson, Ellen Terry, Modjeska, Mrs. Pat Campbell and others. From all accounts Mr. and Mrs. Forbes Robertson are ideally happy in their home life. If I am not mistaken this season marks their first separation, Forbes Robertson appearing in "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" while his wife presents the Frances Hodgson Burnett play. In London they are always together and entertain a great deal in their Russell Square home. Maxine Elliott, by the way, was greatly exercised years ago over the report that her sister might marry a title. At that time Maxine was opposed to international alliances. Nowadays, if reports be correct, her ideas have changed and she would not be adverse to entering the peerage. Who knows but that she may?

The Open Shop in Oakland

The first gun of an open shop campaign has been fired in Oakland by the lumbermen of that city who have come to the conclusion that the closed shop is impairing their business by subjecting them to unfair competition with men in the same line of business in other parts of the State. Five lumber and milling companies have entered into an agreement to ignore the unions, and I hear that altogether there are twenty-five firms across the bay engaged in various lines of business that have decided to adopt the open shop principle. So the fight for independence is now on at the very doors of the metropolis, and if the unions fail to coerce the business interests of Oakland the business interests of this city will probably find that the pinch of competition has become unbearable.

"Pa," said a newspaper man's son, "I know why editors call themselves 'we.'"

"Why?"

"So's the man that doesn't like the article will think there are too many for him to tackle."

The Self-Celebration of Aked

The Rev. Charles F. Aked, familiarly known as John D. Rockefeller's pastor, has an option on the pulpit of the First Congregational Church of this city, and the probability is that he will come hither in the near future and make quite a noise in our midst. This good clergyman appears to have a grievance. Things have not been going to suit him at all, and having the instinct for publicity well developed he has been telling his troubles to the newspapers. From all that he has said I infer that he is not appreciated by the millionaires of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church. They raised his salary once, but they have given no further proof of enthusiasm. When the "call" came from San Francisco and he let it be known that he was considering it, the millionaires showed no signs of emotion. A little later on Aked went back to New York and scolded his rich flock, telling them he would certainly leave them if they did not decide to build a bigger church and "formulate plans for a wider church activity." And still they kept their emotions well in hand. Then he went on in this fashion: "I owe something to the men and women of England who loved me and believed in me, when to the tens of thousands of the free churchmen of England it looked as though I were deserting them in the hour of need." What is it that this pious and zealous gentlemen owes to tens of thousands of Englishmen? When was the hour of their need and what was it they needed? What could have induced the good Dr. Aked to make it appear that he deserted tens of thousands of his countrymen in their hour of need? Did John D. Rockefeller lure him from those tens of thousands and thus place him under a debt of some kind to the men and women that loved him? These and many other questions are suggested to the curious and speculative mind by the remarks of the distinguished clergyman who once made countless thousands mourn.

Pity the Poor Plutocrat

New York's loss will doubtless be San Francisco's gain and yet, though a loyal San Franciscan, I would dissuade the good Dr. Aked from now doing to the multi-millionaires of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church what he once did to tens of thousands of English men and women who loved him. I would dissuade him from deserting them in their hour of need. These multi-millionaires may not love Dr. Aked as countless thousands of plain English Baptists loved him; they may not love him enough to build a monumental edifice for him with a parsonage in harmony therewith; but nevertheless they should not be abandoned on this bank and shoal of time at this hour. If in their hearts filled with love of their ducats they have no room for any other passion Dr. Aked should have pity for them. It is his vocation to soften their hearts and infuse into them sentiments of a religious nature. To abandon them because they have no religious enthusiasm is to shirk, to evade his duty, to confess defeat. John D. Rockefeller and his pals are like the heathen. They need grace more than Dr. Aked needs stained-glass windows or a richly-carved pulpit, mere adventitious aids to success in God's ministry which are scorned by divines devout who are capable of spiritualizing their office. George Herbert was none the less successful as a preacher because the chime with which he summoned men to his pulpit was sounded in the humble belfry of Bemerton. If Dr. Aked wishes to make amends for his desertion of countless thousands of his countrymen, my advice to him is to stay with those hard-hearted and hard-fisted plutocrats who sit tight in their pews and listen without emotion to the word of God and the testimony of the Saints. The awakening of that bunch of bloated bondholders is of more importance than the conversion to Christianity of a whole race of savages. And where is the field in which a follower of St. Paul can achieve a greater, more glorious triumph?

A Great Bookman

During the past week there was stopping at the Palace one of the best known of American bibliopoles, Edmund D. Brooks of Minneapolis. If Brooks had happened to be a successful dealer in beans or buttons instead of in rare books and manuscripts, his presence in San Francisco would have been extensively advertised, but as it was he moved in a small and select coterie where ostentation is rigidly banned and departed as quietly as he came. Brooks is a familiar figure in the bookshops of London, Paris and New York. J. Pierpont Morgan, Harry Widener of Philadelphia and Solicitor-General Lehmann are among the men who eagerly bid for the treasures which are constantly coming into his hands. He took the occasion of his wife's sojourn in Redlands to pay a visit to this city and was a good deal entertained in an informal way. His wife's sister, by the way, is Miss Helen Brooks, a teacher at Mills College. Book collectors all over this country know Brooks' place in Minneapolis where Arthur Upson, the poet, was employed as a cataloguer up to the time of his tragic death. Upson was drowned about two years ago in Lake Minnetonka and the first intimation of his fate came when some of the manuscript poems which he carried at the time were picked up, wet and water-stained, on the shore of the lake. Brooks was formerly a banker but his bibliophilic tastes led him into his present business. Once a year he goes abroad and returns laden with tempting items for his wealthy clients.

Some of His Treasures

One of the most interesting items which Brooks brought with him to San Francisco was the original manuscript of "The Last Rose of Summer" in Tom Moore's handwriting. The text differs somewhat from that finally adopted by the poet. I think it is too bad that one of our millionaires of Irish descent didn't secure this prize when it was within reach. Brooks also had with him an unpublished lyric by Thackeray. It is a poem of five stanzas in the best style of the author. An unpublished manuscript of Carlyle's, a collection of unpublished letters by Charles Lamb; a collection of letters written by Whister to a pupil and so far unpublished, a first edition of Holbein's Dance of Death with original drawings by Leach bound in, a first edition of Gulliver's Travels in two volumes, a manuscript of Sir Edwin Arnold's, an original miniature of George Eliot with a lock of her hair enclosed and several first editions of Dickens with the rare green covers bound in were among the other rarities upon which friends of Brooks were allowed to feast their eyes during his visit here. Brooks attended the recent auction of the first editions collected by F. D. Brandon, the local attorney, and bought a number of volumes. He was surprised at some of the high prices obtained and characterized this city as a fruitful field for the dealer in rare books.

The Late Mr. Ellery

All that lies between the cradle and the grave is uncertain, not excepting the length of time it takes to construct a public building. Indeed there is nothing so uncertain as the time required for any kind of government work. Which reflection was inspired by the discovery that State Engineer Ellery, the man who contributed to the gaiety of the last gubernatorial campaign, has yet to finish the prison building at San Quentin that has been in course of construction several years. This work was taken out of the hands of the prison commissioners by the legislature that preceded the remarkable one now in session at Sacramento. The prison commissioners were hurrying the work to completion when it was turned over to Engineer Ellery and then there came a perceptible change of pace. The prison commissioners becoming impatient asked Mr. Ellery to estimate the time it would take for him to finish the work. He took some time to make an estimate, and it was supposed that he would make a most conservative estimate. He reported that the building would be ready for occupancy in exactly eighteen months and that he would keep well within the balance of the appropriation amounting to thirty thousand dollars. That was over two years ago, and though there have been no strikes on the building, the labor being of the convict variety, Mr. Ellery is still pegging away; and since the making of his estimate he has spent $48,000.

The Discovery of the Press Club

A number of millionaires and prominent citizens otherwise distinguished discovered the Press Club last Thursday night. This may sound amazing but it is the simple truth. Outside of the newspapermen and the few artists, musicians, doctors and lawyers who like to associate with the newspapermen in their hours of recreation, very few know more about the Press Club than that it exists and has existed for many years. So, when the millionaires and prominent cits aforesaid found themselves in the Press Club last Thursday night they experienced on a lower plane the sentiments which filled the bosoms of Columbus and Balboa on certain historic occasions. They felt that they were entering virgin territory and they made no attempt to disguise their surprise. Accustomed to regard the newspaperman as a feverish individual of sleuthing propensities and imperishable persistence, forever on the firing line of events, it dawned upon them suddenly that this breathless embodiment of news actually had his hours of ease and a club to spend them in. Some of them learned for the first time that the reporter sans pad and pencil was a quite human person worthy of a little cultivation, not for any possible influence which he might exert but for his individual qualities. It was a happy discovery and should redound to the benefit of the newspapermen and the millionaires in about equal measure..

A Dinner to the Heroes

The occasion of this dicovery was the dinner tendered by the Press Club to the members of the victorious Washington delegation. It was a modest and an informal affair. The newspapermen waited quietly until the long series of pretentious functions in honor of the heroes had been brought to an end and then invited them to drop into the club and take pot-luck. Nineteen members of the delegation availed themselves of the invitation. William H. Crocker, Leon Sloss, M. H. De Young, Reuben B. Hale, James Rolph Jr., T. Cary Friedlander, James McNab, Justice Fred W. Henshaw, Mayor McCarthy, Rev. Joseph McQuaide, A. W. Scott Jr., Fred B. Lloyd, W. C. Ralston, Robert Roos and Robert Newton Lynch were the exposition committeemen to whom the Press Club came as a good deal of a revelation. Very much the same thing may be said of Joseph D. Grant, William L. Gerstle, Frank L. Brown and Thornwell Mullally who belong to the club but were practically strangers there till Thursday night. The remaining committeemen who attended the dinner, Charles De Young of the Chronicle and S. Fred Hogue of the Post, have been active in Press Club affairs for a long time. That all of these men enjoyed themselves immensely among the newspapermen there can be no doubt. Many of them said that it was the most enjoyable affair which had been given since their return from Washington and their words were accented with sincerity. After the succession of pompous banquets which they had attended a simple dinner and a jinks of the sort for which the Press Club is noted filliped their surfeited appetite for entertainment. They stayed late and went away hoping to be invited again.

The Press Club's Opportunity

The speeches made at this newspaper affair were brief but full of meat. For the first time the committeemen unbosomed themselves in regard to the exposition without reserve. Hale, M. H. De Young, Mayor McCarthy, Father McQuaide, Crocker, Brown, Scott and Hogue did the talking and all took the opportunity to voice certain hopes, warnings and criticisms which might have been misconstrued in a more public gathering but which found receptive and sympathetic hearers in the newspapermen. The part which the Press Club should play in the social program of the Fair was dwelt on at considerable length. "The Press Club of Chicago made the Chicago World's Fair and the World's Fair in turn made the Chicago Press Club," said Frank L. Brown in adverting to this topic. It was the general opinion that the newsgatherers' club should be called upon for assistance in entertaining the dignitaries who come to this city during or before 1915. Having been enthusiastically discovered, the Press Club is to be made the theater of some important functions. "Why shouldn't it take its place with the Gridiron Club of Washington?" asked one of the committeemen. And the sentiment on all sides seemed to be that if it seized its opportunity, it would.

The Six Grades of Tomatoes

Tyson Brothers of Niles supply a great part of the tomatoes for the local market through the firm of Campodonico, Burns and Corriea, commission merchants. It happens occasionally that the growers and the commission men differ in their interpretation of contracts and on one of these occasions the dispute brought them into court. Thomas A. Burns went on the stand and testified, among other things, that there were six grades of merchantable tomatoes. "Will you kindly enumerate them," asked attorney Otto Irving Wise. "The first grade," explained Burns, "is known as number one grade—these tomatoes are put up in tissue paper for the eastern trade; the second grade is the table tomato for salads and so on; the third grade is for cooking; the fourth is for canning; and the fifth"—with a wave of the hand—"is for catsup." "You mentioned a sixth grade," the attorney reminded the witness. "What becomes of that?" "We sell it to Sanguinetti," was the reply.

They Found Portola Dry

It was a merry crowd which journeyed to Portola over the Western Pacific a few days ago. It included Barr Hook of Los Angeles, G. Fred Herr of the Western Pacific and several other blithe spirits. The junket was a hurried one and the junketers were unbecomingly attired in evening clothes and pumps. But J. E. Sexton, who is assistant to the president of the Western-Quincy railroad and who does more than any other man to run Plumas County, had arranged the trip hurriedly and they could not spare the time to change into warmer garments. But there was plenty of good cheer on the train, so they maintained an equable temperature until they reached Portola. With five feet of snow on the ground and Plumas "dry" owing to the personal efforts of Sexton, the frigidity became uncomfortable and the party longed for liquid refreshments, but there was nothing doing. Sadly they sat on boxes in the lonely station and shivered while they waited for the time to return. They were as parched as they were cold and their souls would have been utterly disconsolate if they had not resorted to the cheering expedient of cursing Sexton with all the expletives at their command. When they finally returned to San Francisco with incipient grippe they met Sexton's smiles with gloomy looks and hoarse objurgations. "Did you get the case of liquor I sent ahead to Portola for you?" Sexton blandly asked. "Wha—at?" came the indignant chorus. Then it was discovered that one of the boxes on which the junketers had sat in the dismal station was a case of wet goods intended for their particular delectation. But they did not care to go back for it.

Turkey Trotting in Public

The aftermath of the Mardi Gras still lingers and there are enough spicy bits of gossip to last through Lent. Mrs. Peter Martin's turkey-trot has been criticised but only because Mrs. Martin danced it before the mixed crowd at the Rink. It goes at Burlingame or at private balls however, so why shouldn't Mrs. Martin dance it elsewhere? She does it well, everyone admits, with dignified grace. Cyril Tobin was another Blingumite who joined the crowd on the floor after supper

MISS ANNA PETERS

Randall Borough, the rising young local artist, has recently been engaged on a series of black and white portrait studies of society girls. Among those who have sat for him are Miss Anna Peters, Miss Elyse Schultz, Miss Enid Gregg and Miss Ethel Shorb. This portrait of beautiful Miss Peters is one of the most effective of the series.

when turkey-trotting threatened to become general. He put more spirit into it but after supper the dancing was all more spirited. The turkey-trot is popular on Broadway, by the way, where Miss Blossom Seely, imported from San Francisco, is doing it at Weber and Fields.

A Maid's Criticism

Shortly before her marriage to Mr. Templeton Crocker Miss Helene Irwin attended a very fashionable ball and had the misfortune to lose a diamond earring. Thinking that she might have dropped it in the ladies' dressing room she hurried there and acquainted the maid with her loss. The maid was sympathetic but pessimistic. "I don't think you'll ever find it, Miss Irwin," she said. "Why?" asked Miss Irwin. "Because there's an awfully tough crowd here tonight," was the calm reply.

"Lady" Bob's Activity

The press had a good deal to say recently about the attention which Harry Macmillan, once the accepted suitor of Edna Goodrich, has been bestowing upon Princess Kawananakoa in Honolulu. But it overlooked an interesting fact in this connection: namely, that "Lady" Bob Montgomery has been mentioned by the Honolulu papers as a prominent participant in the entertainments provided by the Nevada miner for the beautiful princess. "Lady" Bob Montgomery is well known in this city, but it will doubtless puzzle many to account for the prefix to her name. While here she was plain Mrs. Bob Montgomery, the wife of Bob Montgomery of the Montgomery-Shoshone Mine. Bob Montgomery has been making his residence in Los Angeles for some time while his wife, during her stay in this city, put up at the St. Francis and entertained on rather a lavish scale. She is now on her leisurely way to the Orient. Her title of "Lady" is not sanctioned by Burke or Debrett, but it has a fetching sound and was probably adopted in the islands where the love of titular distinction is contagious, notwithstanding the abolition of royalty and the substitution of democratic simplicity.

Bonci in Society

When Signor Allessandro Bonci stepped from behind the Japanese screen in the Colonial room of the St. Francis to lift his lyric tenor in song for the delectation of the St. Francis Musical Art Society on Tuesday night, he appeared very happy. If one may apply the word to a tenor from the sacrosanct Metropolitan, he grinned. If one must be more reverential when speaking of so great a man, let us say that he smiled a broad smile of gratification. And well he might, for it was an attractive audience. If one might gauge the appreciation of music possessed by an audience by the splendor of its sartorial adornment, this audience at the St. Francis would rank very high. The ladies, young, old and very old, were a triumph of hobbled, spangled and jewelled modishness. As they outnumbered the men in the proportion of six to one the effect was soothing to the eye and only in a few instances distressing to the ear. And it was an unusually attentive audience. It actually hushed its chatter when the tenor burst into song. It restrained its applause until Mr. Harold Osborn Smith had struck the last note of his accompaniment. It showed all the externals of complete musical appreciation and was lavish of its enthusiasm. Its white gloves were several times in danger of bursting from the vigorous beating of palm on palm. It applauded everything with equal gusto, an indication of good humor if not of discrimination. When the concert had come to an end and everybody was thinking of hats, cloaks and supper, there was a sufficient demonstration to recall Signor Bonci for an encore and when the pianist struck the first chord of "La Donna e Mobile" those who had left the room went scurrying back. If Bonci did not carol this slander on woman's constancy as splendidly as Caruso, he at least gave it with spirit and unflawed technical precision and when he grinned his last grin at its conclusion everybody beamed back at him and gave him a few extra palm-beats for good measure. In point of attendance it was the most successful function of the society for a long time.

The Display of Necks

At these affairs of the St. Francis Musical Art Society decollete gowns have come to be de rigeur, as our bavardes would put it. In honor of Signor Bonci there was a great uncovering of white bosoms. As one of the men irreverently expressed it, "the display of domestic landscape was generous and interesting." But it was not all equally beautiful. Nature has dealt harshly with some of the women who feel themselves obliged to have their dresses cut low. They would do better if they followed the example of the new British queen and adhered exclusively to high-necked dresses. It was evident too that a number of those present were not habituated to fashionable exposure. Some of them actually shivered. Many were not comfortable till they had disposed their scarfs snugly about their necks. Those who exhibited that perfection of neck and shoulders which is the justification of the low-cut gown were the cynosure of admiring masculine eyes and were severely lorgnetted by their less exuberantly endowed sisters. If some of them could have heard the caustic remarks wrung by jealousy from the lips of these envious critics the gooseflesh would have dimpled their pretty backs. But they knew the men approved and were sublimely unconscious of all hostile feminine glances.

Winged Again by Cupid

The many friends of Mrs. Walter Scott Newhall were greatly surprised to read about her engagement to Captain Charles Henry Harlow, U. S. N., for it has often been said and was firmly believed that no one could persuade the beautiful widow to change her name. The belief was a tribute to her undoubted devotion to the memory of handsome "Wallie" Newhall. This approaching marriage will be the handsome and dashing widow's third matrimonial venture. As pretty Nellie Trowbridge when she lived at the old Palace Hotel some thirty years ago, she was one of the most attractive and sought-after belles of her day. It was during conclave week at the old hostelry that the society favorite met Dr. Frank K. Ainsworth, a surgeon connected with the Southern Pacific Hospital and after a brief but ardent courtship, the two were married. Subsequently they were divorced. A few years later she married the young millionaire whose name she now bears. He died two years ago at the Adler Sanatorium, leaving his widow very wealthy. She has since resided in Los Angeles in the magnificent Newhall home where she has entertained so extensively as to become a great favorite in southern society. Mrs. Newhall was a half sister of that Miss Jenks who was the first wife of Charles Sontagg.

Mrs. Jordan's Benefactions

Mrs. James Jordan's generosity has been evidenced in at least two notable instances in the past few months. She came into possession of a large fortune at her husband's death and is disbursing it wisely and with benefit to others. Her gift to the Sorosis Club was a check for $5,000 to cover expenses of furnishing the handsome Assembly Room in the new building which adjoins the Francesca Club in Sutter street. Excellent taste was shown in choosing the gobelin blue hangings and upholstery with yellowed white woodwork. There are silver candle sticks on the fire-place shelf and a very handsome chandelier with silver mountings. More in the way of charity was Mrs. Jordan's gift to the Canadian town which was her birth-place. This was an endowment for a tuberculosis sanitarium which is now under construction and where a certain number of free cases will be treated.

Enlarging the Town and Country

Speaking of women's clubs, the last has been finally house-warmed in its new home, but the Town and Country Club facing Union Square will formally open a new assembly room in the near future. It is now being re-modeled out of several small offices on the top floor of the two-story structure next door. Partitions have been removed and a large comfortable retreat for conversation will be an addition to the library. The Town and Country, by the way, has been more popular than the Francesca with hostesses this season. A number of luncheons and teas have taken place there

The Success of Our Miniaturist

It affords me a good deal of pleasure to chronicle the New York success of Mrs. Rose Hooper Plotner, the miniature painter who went East some time ago to conquer metropolitan judgment. She has triumphed artistically and financially, according to the intelligence brought here by friends who visited her recently. Interest in the daughter of Major Hooper is now widespread and the newspapers have even been interviewing her. She exhibited recently at Knoedler's and the critics noted her "luscious color sense," contrasting her "strength and simplicity" with the "weakness and flabbiness" of most American miniatures. Her presentment in little of Mrs. Francis Gay of Honolulu attracted particular attention. Mrs. Gay is the daughter of Judge Hart and the wife of an island millionaire and is known here. On the occasion of Mrs. Gay's visit to Knoedler's Mrs. Plotner gave a "luau" or Honolulu feast which was attended by many Californians. Mrs. Plotner also gave a tea for Mr. Frederick Hastings, the singer who was here with Tetrazzini, and his wife who was Miss Brooke Rose of this city. Among those who were present were Mrs. John D. Tallant, Miss Elsie Tallant, Miss Lily Lawler and Mrs. Augustine Haraszthy Strickland.

She Paints Dogs

Mrs. Plotner is not confining her artistic endeavors to the depiction of beautiful human beings; she has started a fad in fad-loving New York for the painting of pet canines. Naturally this fad is taking hold. Society women have suddenly discovered that they cannot be happy unless their dogs are done in oils and orders are pouring in. From a newspaper interview I learn that Mrs. Plotner painted Mrs. Pat Campbell's famous "Pinky Panky Poo" and other famous animals not specified. "I like dogs, especially ugly ones," Mrs. Plotner told the interviewer. "I think the face of an ugly dog expresses a great deal more character than that of a handsome man." This dictum reminds one of a cynical saying attributed to Ouida. Mrs. Plotner went on to tell the interviewer how her father sent her to Dresden to study; how she perfected herself in Paris; how she won a prize at the Portland exposition; and how she painted the only existing miniature of President McKinley. The idea of making miniatures of dogs came to her in California when for amusement she painted a miniature of a favorite stag hound.

Vivien Gould Did Not Smoke

Those timorous maids and matrons who are so much behind the times as to look to the mighty for justification of their dalliance with the weed, need not extract any consolation from the published report that Lady Decies who was Vivien Gould, smoked in public on her honeymoon. Following tardily on the heels of the newspaper account of this incident comes a most emphatic denial from the young woman's husband. In the strongest terms at his command the bridegroom declares that the story is a fabrication and to lend authority to his asseveration, adds that if his dainty little bride really cared to smoke he would have not the least objection in the world, which is very sweet and condescending of him and seems to indicate that he will not rule her with that heavy iron British hand one sometimes reads of in novels of English life. But the point is that Vivien Gould Decies probably does not smoke and that those young women who seek to excuse their intimacy with Lady Nicotine to their shocked mammas by simpering, "But Vivien Gould does it and she's younger than I am, even if she is married," are building their edifice of dissipation upon shifting sand.

Californians at the "Natoma" Premiere

Undoubtedly there must have been a great many loyal Californians at the premiere of the Redding-Herbert opera "Natoma" at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. And yet few of their names emerged into print on the morning following. Even the Herald which devoted a page to the affair with several columns of names enumerated only a few whom we know. Clarence Mackay gave a supper in the foyer of the Metropolitan after the opera and among those who were named as attending were Mr. and Mrs. John Hays Hammond, Mrs. Herman Oelrichs, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt Jr., Mr. C. A. Spreckels, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Redding, Miss Redding, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Rollo Peters, Senator and Mrs. Frank Flint and several of our congressmen with their wives. This is a brief list and I looked in vain for others. But I did read, not without emotion, that the supper was attended by "members of the California Society." And is it thus that Californians in New York are lumped together? Are they so unimportant that their individualities are slurred? Are they distinguished only en masse? Verily, it is to weep!

Mrs. Johnson and Sacramento Society

Sacramento society has always been rather tame. Sacramento legislative society, it is quite fair to assume, is of the jay variety, provided one may judge the wives of legislators by the legislators themselves. It is not surprising then that the wife of Governor Johnson will have none of it. Her attitude has been outlined as follows by a writer for the Sacramento Weekly:

"A word to the Sacramento women who are a bit puzzled over the personality of Mrs. Hiram Johnson, and are finding it difficult to discover which zone she inhabits. Socially, in the sense of conventional entertainment, I should say that she prefers the frigid zone and will never take more than a frappe interest in tea fights. Her San Francisco home is on Russian Hill, where artists and writer folk live, and the conventions of Pacific avenue make no appeal. Mrs. Johnson does not express herself in any of the arts, but she has appreciation to the nth degree. Possibly she is more happy when studying effects in interior decoration, for which she has amazing talent, as the rehabilitated gubernatorial mansion will undoubtedly prove. And the Governor's Lady will not unholster her chairs with Bores —she has the salon idea a-swimming in her head if her best friends can read her aright. The wife of a San Francisco legislator told me the other day that a Sacramento acquaintance practically forced a presentation to Mrs. Johnson. The solon's wife was sitting in the hotel with the Sacramento lady when Mrs. Johnson appeared with that calm and sequestered air she carries about with her. 'Here is your chance to introduce me,' commanded the Sacramento dame in a militant whisper, and rose to block Mrs. Johnson's progress. Of course, there was no escape, and the introduction followed, to the amazement of the spectators and the chagrin of the lady impressed into the service. It is useless to waste tissues in undignified scrambles to meet Mrs. Johnson, for the effort is sure to be unproductive, as she is not what the men would term a 'good mixer,' believing that friendship is an affair one should take kneeling, not skipping."

Queen Mary and the Low Neck Dress

Queen Mary of England is no admirer of extreme decollete. As a consequence, the very low-necked dress will rarely be seen at court functions under the present reign and will be little in vogue in English society generally for a time, for when the Queen undertakes to act as arbiter in the matter of dress her word carries far. Already she has made it clear to the ladies of her household that if a dress is cut away at the neck at all it should be as little as possible. At the present time the edicts of the court make it compulsory for low-necked dress to be worn on all "full dress occasions," but this will be greatly modified during the next few weeks. Her Majesty always prefers to introduce innovations gradually, but she has already made it clear that elderly ladies and others who desire to wear high-necked dresses at next season's courts may do so without infringing any detail of court etiquette. The fashion of wearing frocks high at the neck has been coming into vogue for some time past, and has always had a very powerful supporter in the Princess Royal, who has been responsible in some measure for the change of view of the present Queen. Her Royal Highness has always suffered from a delicate throat and chest. She was told by her physicians that there would be no danger to her health in visiting crowded and always sadly over-heated Throne Room at Buckingham Palace on the occasion of the royal receptions if she took the precaution to cover her neck and throat. She communicated this decision to the late Queen, who at first protested strongly against the idea; but the Princess stuck to her point, with the result that eventually her imperious grandmother gave way. This was the thin edge of the wedge, and since that time it has become the inevitable custom of the Princess Royal to appear at all evening functions, with but very rare exceptions, in a high-necked dress. Since then many society leaders have been glad to follow her example, either because, like Her Royal Highness, they suffered from chest complaints, or because the idea of appearing in public with their bosoms partially uncovered was repugnant to them. Queen Mary in her hostility to the low neck gown has the support of King George who differs greatly in this and other matters from the late King Edward.

A Play of Doubtful Cheerfulness

By Edward F. O'Day

A cheerful play should be very welcome at the present time. We are in a melancholy season. Our somber outlook is bounded by wind and rain and cold. Our physical equipoise is disturbed by the twitchings of conscience. Having pushed out from the pleasant shore of Mardi Gras we are paddling on the gloomy waters of abstinence (of a more or less theoretical sort) and are not yet in sight of the flowery banks of Mi-Careme. We would fain inhibit the smiling advances of the world, the flesh and the devil, but lacking the strength to resist them entirely, are more or less oppressed by the consciousness of our wickedness. Like the poor old knight of Chevy Chase we are in doleful dumps. We feel the need of brightening influences. And so when we find the bill boards varicolored by placards announcing that "The Dawn of a Tomorrow" is a "play of cheerfulness," we tell ourselves that here is the tonic for our vapors, the ray of sunshine to light our clouded souls. Well, perhaps "The Dawn of a Tomorrow" is a play of cheerfulness, but personally I must confess a disappointment. I am not a Mark Tapley and am unequal to the task of extracting sunbeams from the cucumbers of melancholy That I am no cynic is evident, for I had an almost touching confidence in the veracity of the bill posters. I took their word for it that I was to be cheered, but as I sat through the three acts at the Savoy the gloom thickened about me till I was a helpless prisoner in the dark tower of despondency. The spectacle of an old man whose mind is slowly disintegrating is not a cheerful one. To assist at a consultation of nerve specialists is not to be surfeited with joy. To watch the victim teeter on ricketty limbs, to hear his outbursts of hysterical laughter and impotent rage and to follow his reeling brain as it tries to concentrate on the thought of suicide while the specialists shake their heads and lie and exchange meaning glances—is this cheerful? I had as lief select a treatise on tabes dorsalis for hammock reading as look for cheer in such a scene. But this was only the first scene after all. Let us give the playwright a chance. The second scene is not reassuring in its beginning. A few lights wink drearily through a London fog. Outside of novels London fogs are not pleasant things, as he will testify who has clung to a dripping lamp post and waited for one to lift. To see one on the stage might please in midsummer but is not altogether gladdening in this winter of our discontent. When the fog lifts we find ourselves in Apple Blossom Court in the East End. Our old baronet is there, less ataxic than before but more than ever bent on suicide. "Glad" appears from her heap of rags, herself a heap of rags, and commences an animated conversation on the efficacy of prayer, the misery of the poor and the selfishness of the rich. Cheerfulness is only a comparative condition, after all, for this conversation cheers the baronet. He forgets about his pistol and shows amazing vivacity in chasing a thief. The cheerfulness of this scene, as I conceive it, lies in the humor of it and the humor consists in the good joke on the three great nerve specialists who gave the old baronet up as hopeless, little dreaming that he was still capable of doing a hundred yard dash or two. While you are still enjoying this side-splitter, a hunted criminal appears. "The Dandy" is not cheerful. Why should he be cheerful with every policeman in London on his trail? Besides he's in love with "Glad" who won't have him—yet. At the end of the first act the playwright has not justified the posters. The second act is not set in cheerful surroundings. We are introduced to a cold grimy room in the slums. We meet a country girl who has been indiscreet and wishes she were dead. We meet a youngster who has sunk to the gutter and very reasonably despairs of becoming a great and wealthy inventor. We see "the Dandy" again and are somewhat brightened when we learn that he is not a murderer after all. But the facts that the police are still after him and that his alibi hangs by a thread of evidence difficult to obtain somewhat dampen the joy we no doubt ought to feel when "Glad" rushes into his arms. Whatever enthusiasm we expend on the renewed dissertations about the power of prayer is of a strictly pious moderation. Certainly we are not carried away by it. It is all very interesting, if you will, but where does the cheerfulness come in? And in the third act? Here we meet a young man who moralizes maudlinly and is very properly sent home and to bed. We meet two gay women, one of whom bangs the piano while the other hears herself compared to Kipling's Vampire. It is a mirthful party, if mirth may be supposed to dress at times in a wet blanket. Enters then "Glad" (who never exactly rises to her nickname) to bargain for "the Dandy's" alibi with a discouraged sort of villain who is not even cheerful under the influence of copious brandy-and-sodas. Compared to the rest of the play I suppose the ending of this act deserves to be called cheerful, for "the Dandy" is saved from the law, the villain is foiled and exposed, "Glad" is in a fair way to get married (though one cannot be expected to felicitate her fervently on her mate), and the old baronet makes up his mind to keep on living. There is really no reason why he shouldn't, for his distressing symptoms have disappeared. If one were only permitted to understand how he was cured, the play would possess a certain pathologic cheerfulness—save the mark!—but it is all a mystery. I think the playwright takes an unfair advantage of the three nerve specialists. I cannot see why "The Dawn of a Tomorrow" should be called a play of cheerfulness. If it is cheerful, a funeral is cheerful and a prolonged visit from mother-in-law is a wild delight. I see no way of injecting a little joy into my notice of it except by cheerfully declaring that the acting of Miss Elliott made it emphatically worth while.

Gossip of the Theatre

The Great Bonci

There is joy in living in San Francisco just now for one can hear the great Alessandro Bonci sing, sing as the angels in heaven must sing and as only a few blessed beings have ever been able to sing on earth. His voice is a lovely lyric tenor, and its every possibility has been so developed by the most intelligent study, that if Signor Bonci hadn't any voice at all to sing with, so to speak, he would still be a wonder and a delight and a spreader of the gospel of song. On the long and varied program of his opening concert there was something to appeal to the taste of every musician, something to delight every student of the intricacies of the difficult art of singing. In his opening group of rarely heard songs which revealed to us at once the high art of the singer he poured into eager ears the purest of golden tones. His second group comprising familiar Mendelssohn and Schubert numbers the perfection of his art was emphasized, and these songs he enunciated in faultless English. Then he sang "How so Fair!" from Martha, but one felt that he had not yet given his cordial audience out of the well-springs of his singers' heart. What treasures lay hidden there was easily divined in his next group of French songs. It must have been a Frenchman in his exuberance at hearing his beloved language so perfectly pronounced who shouted "Bravo!" up where Bonci's own countrymen were crowded. Everyone wanted to echo the "Bravo" for the delicious diminuendo that the singer treated us to in the "Romance" of Debussy. From that moment the great tenor seemed electrified. Then came the event of the afternoon. He sang "Che gelida Manina" from La Boheme with the most marvelous dramatic intensity. Tears sprang into the eyes of temperamental people, cheeks twitched with emotion, Italian hearts swelled proudly in loyal Italian breasts and all nationalities joined lustily in the applause that followed. Next he sang two Macdowell songs, then the "Mattinato" of Leoncavallo. After clamorous recalls he sang "La Donna e Mobile." Delightful it was but undoubtedly he can do it better than he did after such a tremendous program. I long to hear him sing it again as the piece de resistance of a shorter program. Know, dear, generous Signor Bonci, that San Francisco audiences are like the man who had the whole earth for a farm and then wanted a little piece outside for a garden. The glorious Gadski time after time has sung herself hoarse for us and then we have made her give the Valkyrie cry! The superb Schuman-Heink has rendered programs that would wear out the throat of a less vigorous singer, yet we have demanded "More"—and got it. But Tetrazzini—she knows her San Francisco and she just won't and we love her just as well and appreciate her just as much as if she had acceded to selfish demands. Great singers cannot afford to be too prodigal with their precious voices. So Signor, beware! Please don't allow us to treat you like a phonograph. The Columbia was filled to overflowing with music lovers Sunday afternoon with the most enthusiastic concert audience I have ever seen in this city. From a prolonged welcome to the stranger to the last recall at the end to assure him that he is our Bonci forever, it was as demonstrative an audience as an artist ever can expect to sing to in an American city.

Mary Austin's Play

"The Arrow-Maker," the long delayed Indian play of Mrs. Mary Hunter Austin, has just been produced at the New Theater. It is a tale of early aboriginal life, but the moral of the heroine's experience is supposed to have its modern application. The central figure is a Chisera, or medicine woman who has been invested with special authority in the tribe because of her supposed mystical powers. On this account she has been relieved from all communal responsibilities, but she is bound by an oath of celibacy, in order that nothing may interfere with her religious duties. But she is human and falls a victim to the wiles of Simwa, the arrow-maker, whose ambition she promotes until he has become a great war-lord. Then he deserts her to marry the daughter of the chief, and in her rage she denounces him publicly on his wedding day, declaring that both he and the tribe shall suffer for his treachery to her. Her prophecies are fulfilled. Soon Simwa and the tribe become victims of the extremest misfortune, and in their distress, threaten her with death unless she can appease the angry gods. But in her loneliness and misery, deprived of the right to love, she has lost faith, power, and initiative. In time, however, she finds fit objects for her affection in the suffering children, and—the yearnings of the maternal heart being satisfied—she recovers her former energies, and once more directs the tribe to triumph and happiness.

Another Concert by Miss Wilson

Among American singers who have made name and fame abroad as well as in their own country none stands higher than Miss Flora Wilson whose recital at the St. Francis last month for the benefit of the Armitage Orphanage afforded sincere pleasure to a large audience of music-lovers. Those who attended out of curiosity to see the daughter of the Secretary of Agriculture and a prominent Washington society woman, were surprised when they found that Miss Wilson was not an amateur singer but a splendid artist. She rendered a program ranging from the most difficult grand operatic arias to simple Scotch ballads, and it was hard to say which of her numbers pleased the critical audience best. The Shadow Song from "Dinorah," the waltz song from "Romeo and Juliet" and "Ah fors e lun" from "Traviata" were among Miss Wilson's numbers and it is likely that she will include these favorites of her first recital in her program at the second recital to be given March 22 in Scottish Rite Hall, Sutter street and Van Ness avenue. The full program will be given in next week's issue of Town Talk. The concert is to be at popular prices. Tickets may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, the prices ranging from $2.00 to 75 cents.

"The Merry Widow" Once More

Gertrude Elliott will appear for the last times at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and evening and on Sunday night "The Merry Widow" will begin an engagement limited to two weeks. Henry W. Savage offers a fine all-round company. The role of Sonia falls to Mabel Wilber who has appeared here twice before in the character. Charles Meakins who was with the original New York company will be Prince Danilo. A newcomer will be Ivy Scott, an Australian prima donna, making her first American appearance in the role of Natalie.

Ferruccio Busoni Next

Manager Will Greenbaum offers as the opening attraction at the new Scottish Rite Auditorium of which he has assumed the sole management, Ferruccio Busoni, the Italian pianist who is duplicating the sensation caused by Paderewski wherever he plays. Busoni is said to be a marvelous performer. He will give two concerts in this city, the first on Sunday afternoon, March 19, when he will offer a program of Chopin and Liszt works and one of his own transcriptions of a Bach "Prelude and Fugue" for organ. A special feature will be his performance of the difficult Liszt transcription of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" popularly called the "Don Juan Fantasie." The second and last concert will be given Tuesday night, March 21.

"The Substitute" and Max Figman

"The Substitute" which will be given by Max Figman at the Alcazar next week is said to be a better play than "The Man on the Box." It was written by Beulah Dix and Evelyn Greenleaf, authors of "The Road to Yesterday." Excellent opportunity for effective acting is furnished all the principals in the cast. Lolita Robertson, Viola Leach, Bessie Barriscale, Adele Belgarde, Will R. Walling, Louis Bennison, Burt Wesner, Charles Gunn and Howard Hickman will be in the cast.

Mischa Elman, Russian Violinist

On Sunday afternoon, March 26, Mischa Elman, the Russian violin virtuoso who has been called "the mastersinger of the violin" will give the first of a series of three concerts at Scottish Rite Auditorium. Elman is twenty years of age but his fame is world wide. It is two years since he played here and his development in that short space of time is said to have been great. Elman plays on two Sunday afternoons and the intervening Thursday night, besides a concert in Oakland at Ye Liberty on Friday afternoon and an appearance before the St. Francis Musical Art Society.

Another Week of "Every Little Movement"

Unusual in many respects is the engagement of "Madame Sherry" at the Columbia. The performance is all that was claimed for it; the company is great; and theatergoers are attending in record numbers. The management has arranged for two extra matinees during the company week. They will be given on Wednesday and Friday in addition to the regular Saturday matinee.

Francis Wilson in "The Bachelor's Baby" follows. The advance sale of seats opens next Thursday.

Another Good Bill at the Orpheum

B. A. Rolfe and his Rolfonians will give an instrumental act at the Orpheum next week. Rolfe is a cornet soloist. His support is versatile in vocal and instrumental ability. Lola Merrill and Frank Otto will present "After the Shower," a summer flirtation with tuneful numbers. The Six Flying Banvards are renowned as daring and skillful aerialists. Jarrow, the originator of the famous "Lemon Trick" will give a taste of his quality. Next week closes the engagements of Bernard and Weston, Mr. and Mrs. Jimmie Barry, "The Fire Commissioner" and The Four Huntings.

The Bonci Farewell

The farewell concert of Alessandro Bonci will be given this Sunday afternoon at the Columbia. The seats are on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's or may be had at the theater on Sunday after ten o'clock. Bonci will sing some of the masterpieces by Cimarosa, Gluck, Rossini, Carissimi, Chadwick, Blumenthal and by special request Dvorak's "Songs My Mother Taught Me." In operatic selections his program will be rich.

Ye Liberty to Stage "Colorado"

For the first time on the Pacific Coast the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty, Oakland, will stage next week "Colorado," by Augustus Thomas. It is a stirring story of mining life and when produced originally in New York with a cast headed by Wilton Lackaye achieved a big success.

Our New Concert Auditorium

The new Scottish Rite Auditorium at the corner of Van Ness and Sutter streets which cost over half a million dollars is not to be used exclusively by the Masonic body which built it, for Will Greenbaum has leased the two lower floors which contain a beautiful concert and ball room, a smaller auditorium for chamber music and recital concerts and a splendid banquet hall where tables may be set for a thousand people. It is an institution which this city needed badly and we may expect to see this beautiful edifice the scene of many splendid musical and social events. The main auditorium will seat about sixteen hundred people.

How I Wrote the "Washington Post"

Altogether I have some two hundred compositions to my credit, and it is now more years than I care to remember since I took my first composition to a publisher. I paid $25 for its publication, but it was a bad investment, for nobody took the slightest interest in Sousa's initial effort. I had another try, and this time took two compositions to a publishing firm in Philadelphia, who said they were willing to use them and pay for them. "How much?" I asked, breathlessly. They would give me a hundred copies of each piece. Considering that the journey had cost me some $15, it did not seem that I should make a fortune very rapidly at this rate. Nevertheless I accepted but I do not remember hearing that the publishers became millionaires after publishing my two pieces.

And then came the "Washington Post" March, which brought me exactly $25 in cash and a small fortune in reputation. This march is not, as is generally supposed, named after a mail coach plying to and from Washington. It is named after one of the leading newspapers in the United States capital, whose proprietors many years ago promoted a competition amongst school children for the best essay, which caught on to such an extent that the National Museum grounds at Washington were needed for the distribution of the prizes.

I was there with the Marine Band, of which I was then conductor, and played for the first time in public a march specially composed for the occasion, which, by common consent, was called after the enterprising newspaper, the "Washington Post." Although it attracted some attention, the publishers to whom I offered it told me that they could only assume the risk and financial expense of publishing the "Washington Post" provided I would assign my exclusive rights for $25. I knew the firm were enterprising and would push whatever they published, and I consented. But, of course, I had no idea that the "Washington Post" would become so popular in every quarter of the globe. However, although it only brought me, as I say, $25 in cash, it brought me into such prominence that I was quickly inundated with requests for more marches.

By the way, in common with others possessing commodities valuable enough to filch, I have been persistently pestered by music pirates. Hence the following little story. Some time after the "Washington Post" had become widely popular, my wife and I were spending a holiday in Italy. One day we were in St. Mark's Square, Venice, when the municipal band appeared to give its daily concert. Naturally interested, I listened to the performance and was much gratified when, after playing several numbers, the orchestra struck up the "Washington Post." While they were playing, I noticed a music shop in the square, which I entered, and with becoming gravity asked the shopkeeper the name of the piece the band was playing.

"That," said the music-dealer, after listening a moment, "is the 'Washington Post' march." I then asked for a copy. After searching his shelves the shopkeeper found he had run out, but volunteered to supply one within an hour. On returning after that lapse of time, I was presented with an Italian edition of the piece, by Giovanni Filipo Sousa. Taking the copy, I went to the piano and played through the first few bars.

"Yes, that's it," I said to the shopkeeper. "But this Giovanni Filipo Sousa, who is he?" The music vender volubly explained that he was a celebrated Italian composer. "Indeed!" I remarked; "and is he as famous as Verdi?" "Well, no, signor," replied the Venetian; "but then he is only young yet." —By John Philip Sousa.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Washington politics has been the dominating influence in the security market in the recent week. As a result there was some heavy liquidation of speculative accounts on account of the uncertainty of the political outlook in the matter of an extra session during which tariff agitation is not unlikely to be a feature. In view of this unsettlement leading bankers set the market back and started a selling movement to fortify Wall Street in the event of unfavorable conditions during the coming week. The speculative situation has been clarified and stocks have undoubtedly passed into stronger hands. During the extra session of Congress it is not certain that anything but the reciprocity bill will receive attention. We look for much higher prices later on.

Wheat—March first saw the lowest prices for wheat during the crop year to date. Since that time there has been steadily increasing strength. It developed that the lowest prices were made by short selling and not by liquidation by holders. Practically all of the recovery has been due to an attempt by these short sellers to buy the wheat back again in the open market. Speculative buying by professional traders who were quick to note the failure of liquidation at the low levels, was almost if not entirely responsible for the desire of the short interests to cover. It is true that the commercial situation has improved a trifle but neither that nor any other influence has been more than incidental to the speculative campaign. Certainly none of the commercial factors are important enough of themselves to turn the market from its previous extreme depression. Probably the most important of the incidental influences was the falling off in marketings at primary centers. Reciprocity has as frequently had one bearing as another on the speculative mind. The government will issue its annual report on farm reserves soon and it should be around 182 million bushels. Some of the extremists figure it as high as 200 million bushels. In fact the government last week made announcement regarding the crop movement indicating this.

Corn displayed considerable speculative activity last week, due in a large measure to the interest of local professional traders. There has been a little increase in sales from the country but not nearly as much as was warranted by the improvement in the weather and the country roads. On the other hand there has been an extremely small domestic and export trade. Actual clearances from former sales however have been liberal.

Cotton—Large buying orders in the May option said to have come from the leading spot houses constituted the principal factor in the market during the past week and shorts were forced to cover in the distant futures. There was also talk of a better trade outlook, not only in this country but also in Manchester. Spot cotton in the southern markets remained firm and the price did not yield to the break in futures of the previous week. This more than anything else gave encouragement to the bulls. However, reports of curtailment again made their appearance and later in the week sentiment became bearish with prices at the end of the week about where they left off the previous week. Australian cables reported spinners starting on 25 per cent curtailment and a cut in print cloths of one-fourth cent per yard at Fall River was reported which put cotton goods down to a basis of only about twelve cent cotton and means a further increase of curtailment by American mills. The world's visible supply of American cotton now promises to figure about 1,200,000 bales on August 31 which would be the second largest on record. Spot interests look for spinners to re-enter the market around fourteen cents which might check the decline and cause a temporary recovery. But we would not recommend purchases for a long account as with new crop prospects good, lower prices than have yet been seen are inevitable.

Local Securities—The recent annual report of the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company is a very interesting document on the local situation. The following are the principal items as compared with the previous annual report:

	1909	1910
Capital Stock (Common)	$18,000,000	$18,000,000
Capital Stock (Preferred)	18,000,000	18,000,000
Bonds	23,000,000	29,375,000
Cash and accounts receivable	1,901,792	3,451,837
Bills and accounts payable	3,881,938	6,823,342
Excess payables over rec'bls	1,980,146	3,371,505
Gross earnings	12,885,017	14,667,111
Net earnings	1,243,528	1,199,204
Dividends	1,080,000	1,080,000
Surplus	163,528	119,204
Maintenance and repairs	4,700,571	5,358,111
Total stations	392,822	446,622
Ratio increase in stations	19.1%	13.6%
Earned on common	.9%	.6%
Ratio maintenance to gross	36.4%	36.5%
Ratio maintenance to plant	11.2%	10.7%
Maintenance per station	$13.00	$12.70
Gross income per station	$35.60	$34.90

Notes.—The capital stock remains unchanged. Some of the $6,375,000 of the 5 per cent bonds have been issued. Even then new construction has required so much capital that the excess of accounts payable, etc., has increased to $1,391,359. Gross earnings show a very satisfactory increase and net earnings show a small surplus over the preferred stock dividend. The situation, however, is perfectly healthy, because not only has an adequate amount been expended from the earnings for maintenance, but there has also been a considerable addition to reserves and about $600,000 has also been charged off the bond discount account. This latter is still over $2,000,000 and will call for at least similar charging off for three years. The operating end is very satisfactory in every detail but from a financial standpoint there are a number of problems ahead. The company is growing tremendously and will need more new capital immediately and for some time to come. We can see nothing adverse to the present bond or preferred stock issues in the situation, however. As to the common stock we can see no justification for the present market price. Intrinsically the value seems to be less than 30½, this being the total of the surplus and reserve accounts. Dividends cannot be expected for some time.

corner was a feed-trough, where a donkey was patiently munching his ration of hay. On the opposite side was a broad bed, with iron legs that stood unsteadily upon the stone flooring of the room. It was there that the three brothers would fling themselves down to sleep, but never all three at once, since first one and then another took his turn at standing guard at night in the fields. The rest of the room was cumbered with various farming implements. Wooden steps led to the room in the garret, where the old couple and the orphan slept.

Giovanni had sunk upon the edge of the bed, leaning forward upon the disordered bedding, with his head buried in his arms. His aged mother kept her eyes fixed upon him, while she wept and wept, ceaselessly, silently, as though all her heart, all her being, would fain dissolve and pass away in tears.

Hearing someone come in, the priest raised his head, took one wild glance around, and then dropped his face once more upon his arms. His three brothers caught a brief glimpse of his haggard face, with the bristling beard intensifying his repellant pallor. They gazed at him for a time with a sense of mingled repulsion and pity; they noted that his robe was torn in many places, and then, as their glance descended, they saw that the silver buckle of one shoe was missing.

The aged mother, seeing her three other sons, burst into sobs and covered her face with her hands.

"Hush, mother, hush!" Carmine urged her, his own voice choked with emotion, seating himself upon a chest beside the bed, together with his brothers, to wait in silence for the father's coming. They all three had the same sickly, spiritless appearance, the same lean, bony frames; they all three wore black, knitted caps, thrust far back upon their heads; they all three had little hoops of gold in their ears. And, sitting in a row, they represented the same identical aspect of painful suspense.

At last, the old man entered the courtyard, bowed over, with his hands behind his back, gazing on the ground. He too wore upon his head a cap similar to those of his sons, but discolored and full of holes. His hair was straggling and there was a month's growth of beard on his chin.

"Cheer up, Siroli!" exclaimed Lubruno's representative, rising to meet the old man. "Cheer up, I tell you! It's all straightened out!"

Old Siroli fixed his eyes, black and still bright, upon those of the representative, but without answering, as though he had either not heard or not understood. The latter, who was a big, jovial fellow, with an enormous chest, and a ruddy face, laid a hand upon his shoulder, with an air at once reassuring, patronizing and ironical, and repeated:

"It's all straightened out; a quick cure, that's the name of it!" and he laughed knowingly. "Yes, indeed! When we are lucky enough to have a master who appreciates our devotion and fidelity, certain * * * certain indiscretions may be overlooked. Boyish folly, after all; you know what I mean? Mere trifles * * *"

The old man restrained himself, raging inwardly.

"In a word, what have you come to tell me?" he demanded, with proud and threatening eyes.

The officer took his hand from the other's shoulder, clasped it with his other hand behind his back, threw out his chest, raised his head as though to look down upon the old man from above, and blurted out:

"Here's what I come for. The master, chiefly out of respect for the cloth your son wears, and partly out of pity for you, has been so active in the matter that the charges have been withdrawn. So that now your son will be sent to Acireale."

Old Sirolo, who had so far listened with his eyes on the ground, raised his head.

"To Acireale?"

"Yes, indeed. Our bishop has an understanding with the bishop over there."

"An understanding?" the old man questioned further. "An understanding about what?"

"What about? Why about your son's little * * * blunder; can't you understand?" the overseer exclaimed, losing his patience. "They will close their eyes, that's all, and nothing more is to be said about it."

The old man clenched his fists, turned pale and murmured:

"The bishop will do this?"

"He will do this and more," rejoined the overseer. "Your son will stay a year or two at Acireale, in expiation, until the affair is hushed up. Then he will come back, and conduct mass the same as ever; don't you be afraid about that."

"He?" cried old Siroli, pointing with trembling hands towards the house. "He, with his hands, touch the consecrated host?"

The overseer lightly shrugged his shoulders: "If his Reverence forgives——"

"His Reverence may, but I won't!" promptly answered the outraged old man, beating his breast with his gnarled and callous hand. "Come, and see for yourself!"

Still vibrating with scorn and anger, he entered the ground-floor room, hurried to the bed on which the priest still remained huddled in the same position, seized him by the arm, and with one violent jerk drew him to his feet.

"Up with you! Off with your frock!"

The priest, standing in the middle of the room, with his robes all wrinkled upon his back, his thin calves uncovered, hid his face behind his upraised arms. The three sons and the mother, still seated, gazed in consternation first at Giovanni, then at the father, whom they had never seen in such a mood before. The overseer witnessed the scene from the threshold.

"Up with you! Off with your frock," repeated the old man, shaking with anger, "or I will strip it from you by force! Up with you, up, up!" And so speaking, he drove him forcibly up the wooden steps. Then he turned to his wife, who was sobbing aloud, and sharply commanded her to be quiet. The old woman at once stifled her sobs, bowing her head several times in sign of obedience. It was the first time that her husband had ever spoken to her like that, in loud tones.

The overseer, standing on the threshold unheeded, shrugged his shoulders and blurted out:

"But why in the world, you old fool, if everything has been straightened out——?"

"You there, hold your tongue!" cried the old man, turning savagely upon him. "Go and make your report to his Reverence!"

Slowly he mounted the wooden steps. Giovanni, already up there, had taken off his robes and was in his shirt-sleeves, waist-coat and knee-breeches, sitting beside his father's bed. All at once he buried his face in his hands.

The old man stood for a while watching him, his face eloquent with contempt and disgust; then he commanded:

"Take that buckle off your shoe!"

The son bent over to obey. His father then approached him, saw that he still wore the priest's cap on his head, and snatched it from him, a clump of hair with it. Giovanni sprang to his feet, beside himself with anger. But the old man, with a terrible gesture, pointed to the stairs:

"Down with you! No, wait! Here is a spade. And I am too kind to you because you are no longer worthy even of this. Your brothers till the ground., and you are not fit to stand beside them. Even the work you do will be accursed in the sight of God!"

Left alone, the old man took the frock, brushed it, folded it carefully, and kissed it; he gathered up from the ground the silver buckle and kissed it; he took up the priest's cap, and kissed that also; then he opened a long, old, oaken chest, that looked like a coffin, in which the clothing of his three dead children were religiously preserved, and making the sign of the cross above them with his hand, he laid away these garments of his son the priest.

He closed the chest, seated himself upon it, buried his face between his hands, and gave way to heart-broken sobs.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY AN ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—Dept. No. 10, Probate, No. 29, N. S.

In the matter of the Estate of JULIUS FRIEDMAN, Deceased.

Edward R. Lande and I. M. Friedberg, Executors of the Last Will and Testament of Julius Friedman, deceased, having presented to the Court, and filed herein, their duly verified petition praying for an Order of Sale of Real Property belonging to the estate of said decedent, hereinafter described, and it appearing to the Court from said petition that it would be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of said estate, and those interested therein, that said real property, the sale of which is asked for in said petition, should be sold, and good cause appearing therefor,

It is hereby ordered by the Court that all persons interested in said estate appear before this Court, Department No. 10, Probate, at the Courtroom of said Department, in the Grant Building, on the Southeast corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, on Wednesday, the 22d day of March, 1911, at ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, to show cause why an Order should not be granted to said Executors, for the sale of all that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Southeasterly line of Harrison Street with the Northeasterly line of Beale Street; running thence Northeasterly and along said line of Harrison Street thirty (30) feet; thence at right angles Southeasterly eighty (80) feet; thence at right angles Southwesterly thirty (30) feet to said line of Beale Street, and thence at right angles Northwesterly and along said last mentioned line eighty (80) feet to the point of commencement, being a portion of 100 Vara Block No. 333, together with the improvements thereon.

Further ordered that a copy of this Order be published once a week for four successive weeks before the time appointed for said hearing, in "Town Talk," a weekly newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Done in Open Court this 15th day of February, 1911.
THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 34,365.

HATTIE ELIZA POND, Plaintiff, vs. WILLIAM H. POND, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, Send Greeting to: William H. Pond, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful neglect of plaintiff, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion of plaintiff, and on the ground of defendant's habitual intemperance; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 24th day of February, A. D. 1911.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 33,681, Dept. No. 10.

PLINY E. RITNER, Plaintiff, vs. GRACE I. RITNER, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, Send Greeting to: Grace I. Ritner, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion of plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 18th day of January, A. D. 1911. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

Auto Notes

According to Calvin E. Eib, there is a great demand for the Lozier among people who have read of its speed performances. "It is not," says Eib, "that the purchasers are all looking for a car of speed, but rather because they realize that a machine, to complete a gruelling race at the speed attained by the Lozier, must have something in materials and mechanism far beyond the ordinary."

A record has been made for the run between Fresno and Tulare by E. M. Cox of the latter city, in a 1911 Hudson "33" car. Mr. Cox had just taken delivery of the machine from A. C. Wheelock, the Pioneer Automobile Company's representative in Fresno, and driving the car fully equipped and without special preparation made the run of forty-five miles in one hour and thirteen minutes. This trip is made over a particularly bad stretch of road.

The Haynes Auto Sales Company report a decided increase of activity, promising the opening of an unusually prosperous spring trade. Among the recent sales of Haynes cars are a five-passenger touring to Mrs. Florence Eppinger and a roadster to Lansing K. Trevis.

According to advices received by the local branch of the Diamond Rubber Company, the most remarkable tire service record for the Portland Reliability Run was that made by the Diamond Truck Tires, which equipped the White three-ton truck, which won the race with absolutely no tire trouble of any kind.

W. C. Hood, general sales manager of the Chalmers Motors Company of Detroit, has been spending some time on the Pacific Coast. Mr Hood had a Chalmers "30" roadster shipped from the factory and has used it in covering the coast, keeping in close touch with all Chalmers dealers and studying road conditions.

Through the invention of the standard universal quick-detachable demountable rims that fit all tires, the problem of interchangeability has been solved, and the automobile accessory manufacturing industry has been revolutionized. The tire manufacturers who have been responsible for more than 96 per cent of the rims heretofore made, have now turned over to the United Rim Company all automobile rim patents, together with engineering data and all other available information, for the purpose of establishing a universal standard.

461 Market St., San Francisco

With the completion and occupancy of the new structure of the Pioneer Automobile Company, the city boasts an automobile building easily the equal in size and elegance of the best in the country. Located on the corner of Locust and Van Ness avenues and covering an entire half of the block between Locust avenue and McAllister street, this new structure presents an imposing appearance in the heart of the automobile district. Among other things it evidences the proportions to which the motor car business has grown in San Francisco and stands out in sharp contrast to the squat wooden buildings that housed the various automobile agencies here a few years ago. It also bespeaks the success and prosperity achieved by the Pioneer Automobile Company, which was the first firm to undertake the sale of what was then known as "horseless wagons" on the San Francisco market.

"More motor cars will be sold during the next five years over that region bounded by Lake Michigan on the east and stretching from the Canadian border on the north to the Mississippi river on the south, than in any other corresponding area in this country." Charles T. Jeffery, head of the Rambler organization, makes this prediction as the result of a trip of investigation through the Northwest, during which plans were made for even further extensions of the Rambler sales and service organization in that territory.

Hammond—Don't you dread the silent watches of the night?

Martin—No; it's the cuckoo clocks that give me away.

"A Texas Pioneer"

We are indebted to Mr. August Santleben for a remarkably interesting narrative in "A Texas Pioneer." Usually a volume of biographical and personal reminiscences will attract readers only amongst the writer's own friends, unless he be some world-renowned celebrity, but though Mr. Santleben does not claim to be more than an industrious and law-abiding citizen, there is not a page to be skipped and one wishes that he had gone into more particulars and given the details of still more of his enterprises and adventures. His first acquaintance with the hardships of pioneer life was made at the age of five months when the ship in which his father's family had sailed from Hanover in 1845 was wrecked in Galveston harbor. At eleven he was driving an ox team and at twelve he was hired out to a neighboring farmer to plow new land. At fourteen he was carrying the mail in a region infested by marauding Indians. Before he was twenty-one Mr. Santleben had two mail contracts of his own and a year later he was half owner in a stage line running from San Antonio to Monterey, Mexico. In 1869, at an age when the modern youth is still sauntering his lazy way through school, our author had established a freighting business to Chihuahua. Incidents of the road, such as the meeting with ladrones, Indian raiders and other outlaws and anecdotes concerning passengers are all related in a most entertaining manner. The author either has an exceptional memory or has kept careful records. He speaks of little that he does not know of his own knowledge and the painstaking manner in which he identifies the people whom he mentions should make it an easy matter to check inaccuracies, if there are any. There is a circumstantial list of those known to have been killed by Indians west of Guadaloupe river between 1843 and the final subjugation of the savages, as well as a roster of the settlers in each direction from San Antonio out into the wilds. In addition there is a list of the early residents of San Antonio and of the location of the places of business occupied by the pioneer merchants. A good map would add much to this most interesting recital and surely an illustrated edition, if it were possible to secure the proper old pictures, should make its appeal to the loyal citizens of San Antonio. The Neale Company are the publishers.

Book Notes

The title of Victor Mapes' novel, "The Gilded Way," classifies it at once as another exposure of the domestic life of the younger generation of New York's plutocracy. Though well written and with striking dramatic situations, it is only a modification of what is now an old story—the spoiled children of wealth indulged from their cradles, never obliged to exert their minds or bodies at the behest of aught save their own wills, undisciplined, untrained, and able to escape or mitigate every penalty through the chink of their dollars. Published by the Neale Company

If all boys' books were on a par with those of Clarence B. Burleigh the term "juvenile" would come to have a more reputable significance than it now enjoys. While his youthful heroes have as many hair-breadth adventures as is consistent with probability they are never harebrained irresponsibles and while there is an abundance of fun and achievement there is likewise something to be learned besides the outwitting of school masters and the hazing and bullying of juniors. Any red-blooded boy of twelve who has read one of Mr. Burleigh's books is ready to graduate at once into a course of Stewart Edward White. "The Young Guide" is the third of a series of tales of the Maine woods. Published by Lothrop, Lee & Shepard.

Emerson Hough's "54-40 or Fight," which appeared about two years ago, was the first of a trilogy of American political romances. It dealt with the acquisition of new territory and the causes which led to the abandonment of the claim for a more northern boundary line on the Pacific Coast. The second of the series, "The Purchase Price," takes up the era of compromise in which it was sought to placate all sections of the country, the extreme northerners of abolitionist principles, the extreme southerns intent on the extension of the slavery area and that large class of every variation of complexion which stood between the two. Mr. Hough is one of the few writers who has the courage to admit that the South was unfairly treated, that, having paid its full share in both coin and blood in the acquisition of new territory, it was always cheated out of its proportion of the spoils, with the inevitable result that rancor was engendered. The story covers the period of that upflame of universal brotherhood which was promoted by the Hungarian revolt under Kossuth and the visit of that patriot to the United States. As in its predecessor, "54-40," the action centers about a beautiful woman. From the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

So many years ago that a new reading generation has almost had time to grow up, there appeared in a leading magazine one of those heartbreaking, unforgettable stories the tragic pathos of which grips each heart as though it were a private sorrow. Perhaps there are few of its long-ago readers who can now recall the title of the periodical which published it or who connect the name of Ruth McEnery Stuart with its authorship, but there are none who have forgotten "The Unlived Life of Little Mary Ellen." Though not new in the sense of this being its first appearance, "The Unlived Life of Little Mary Ellen" is new in book form and new to this generation of readers. It is one of the pretty, decorated publications of the Bobbs-Merrill Company, the embellishments being by Ruth Sypherd Clements.

Max Heinrich's "Correct Principles of Classical Singing" commends itself. It is intended primarily for singers and students, but apart from the technical advice and information the pages are replete with common sense observations and criticisms, which should appeal to the general reader. Two-thirds of the contents of the volume is given over to the art of oratorio singing. The book belongs in the library of everyone interested in the art of singing. From Lothrop, Lee & Shepard.

Can't Afford It?

Let's Figure It Out and See

How much would you give on a stormy day to be able to visit a distant friend or send your voice to the provision dealer's?

How much would it be worth, in case your child were taken suddenly ill at night, to be able to summon the Doctor at once and, perhaps, by special instructions from him by wire, be able to give temporary relief pending his arrival, or even to save its life?

Add these incidents to many others that will suggest themselves, multiply them by the number of times they may occur during the year, and ask yourself—

Can I afford to be without a Telephone?

ILLUSTRATED LIST COUNTRY AND TOWN ESTATES AND RESIDENCES FOR SALE AND TO LET

Published under four classifications, viz:

1. Landed estates for sale and to let.
2. Unfurnished houses and resorts for sale and to let.
3. Furnished houses and resorts for sale and to let.
4. Furnished and unfurnished apartments to let.

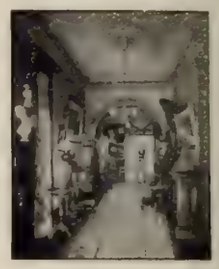
TO SETTLE AND SEGREGATE AN ESTATE

To Be Sold—Thirty-five minutes to San Francisco, this substantial mansion occupying a situation of exceptional beauty. The estate consists of the home, outbuildings, large stable and 47,000 square feet of land, in its entirety costing over $55,000. The land is surrounded by a marble bulkhead, being a corner 200x225 feet. The house is 3 stories, contains 16 rooms and 2 baths, billiard room, conservatory, and is heated by a furnace. In construction the old colonial disregard for extravagance in choice of woods is shown—the stairway is solid black walnut, while the woodwork of the chambers is in birdseye maple. The property is located in the center of the population of East Oakland, in the Thermal Warm Belt, and is an ideal family home or a remarkable opportunity for a high class and exclusive sanitarium. Can be bought for less than one-fourth its cost. Convenient payments can be arranged. Laymance Real Estate Co., Sale Agents, 1214 and 1216 Broadway, Oakland, Cal. Phone Oakland 328.



IN A FAVORITE PART OF BERKELEY

$8,500—This classic English residence, where the exterior is constructed of cement and the interior is finished in Port Orford Cedar is offered at this extremely low figure. Although located at an altitude affording a never-to-be-interupted view of San Francisco Bay, there is no wearisome climb as the traction cars are but two level blocks away. There are 8 rooms and basement, where is installed a furnace, 5 bed rooms, 2 baths, large living and dining room and kitchen. This place was built as a home by the owner and is a truly ideal and convenient residence. Dodge ver Mehr Co., 2015 Shattuck Ave., Berkeley, Cal. Phone Berkeley 3358.

FIFTY DOLLARS UNFURNISHED; SIXTY DOLLARS FURNISHED

These admirably located apartments, constructed with great care for the comfort and convenience of the occupants, are perhaps the most desirable renting accommodation on the east side of the bay. They consist of 5 rooms each and bath, the conventional arrangement is relieved by one of the sleeping rooms being built out of doors. It is shown in the right of the picture with the canvas drawn. This, of course, at the option of the lessee can be glassed in. The general arrangements of these apartments with their dainty buffet, kitchen and conveniences have quite captivated those who have seen them. Corner of Telegraph avenue and Woolsey street, a block from the new S. P. electric station and 5 minutes to Key Route. Phone Berkeley 5079.

TEN MINUTES FROM THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA—THOUSAND OAKS

This grand and beautifully wooded acreage, for years the playground of nature lovers and Mecca of picnic parties, is being subdivided for home sites. The landscape engineer has supplemented nature's profusion in this wonderful place so that the general contour of the country may not be disturbed. Situated on the western slope of the Berkeley hills overlooking the bay of San Francisco it occupies an ideal position for a home. These properties can be bought for from $25 to $35 per foot, all street work done. Directly accessible by the Key Route or Southern Pacific electric when finished. Apply to Newhall-Hendricks, Inc., 2637 Shattuck avenue, Berkeley, Cal.

A BEAUTIFUL ELIZABETHAN HOME

$30,000—Situated on a 6-mile avenue. This complete residence cost the owner $50,000. Located midway between Oakland and Berkeley it has the educational advantages found in a college town while the city is but a short car ride away. From the rear of this home an unrivaled view of San Francisco Bay can be had while from the front of the house the Berkeley hills mark the sky line. The interior finish is mahogany, while every modern convenience is installed. A rare offering presenting a combination of delightful residential and speculative features. The draperies and hangings go with the place. Thirty-five minutes from San Francisco. Laymance Real Estate Co., 1214 and 1216 Broadway, Oakland, Cal. Phone Oakland 328.

THIRTY-FIVE MINUTES FROM TOWN

$7,000—This substantial 8-room house—built by the owner as a home—is offered for sale. The lower floor consists of 5 rooms, the living and dining room being paneled and finished in subdued tones of brown. The breakfast room, kitchen, servant's room and a large back porch that can be used as a conservatory complete this floor. The second floor has three large bed rooms, the two rear rooms opening to a large covered sun deck or sleeping porch 27x14. The never tiresome Berkeley hills are the view from this porch while a splendid view of San Francisco Bay by day or the city sparkling in the night can be had from the front of the house. Heated by 2 fire places and furnace, lawn back and front of house, berry arbor and stable with concrete floor. Owner, 6652 Dana street, Oakland, Cal. Phone Piedmont 3118.

AN EXCEPTIONAL OPPORTUNITY

$5,500—This new modern house carries the old story "too large for the owner." It is built on a delightful corner, East Telegraph avenue but in Berkeley, and is modern in every particular, consisting of 6 rooms with 3 bed rooms on the second floor, living room, dining room and kitchen on lower floor. The house faces west and great care was taken in its construction, the rooms being large and light. It is particularly accessible, being but 2 blocks from the new S. P. electric station, 1 block east of Telegraph avenue, 2 blocks north of Alcatraz avenue. Terms can be arranged. Owner, 2400 Woolsey street, Berkeley. Phone Berkeley 4641. Thirty-five minutes from town. (Inspected and recommended.)

One thousand dollars less than any similar house in Oakland; the greatest bargain on the market; get busy, save commission, buy from owner and builder. For sale, grand 7-room stucco house, matchless in color and appointments; large sleeping balcony; 2 fireplaces; handsome built-in sideboard and bookcases; beamed ceilings, paneled walls, hardwood floors, elegant staircase; buffet kitchen; sun in every room; sleeping apartments upstairs; marine and hill view; large lot, 50x130; driveway. If you want a fine home, see this; choice residence section; convenient to local lines and Key Route; terms if desired. W. A. Sleep & Bros., 6453 Duncan street, near Woolsey.

Uncle Sam and Mexico

There has been a good deal of speculation regarding President Taft's motive for putting our army and navy within striking distance of Mexico, and some criticism of the President has emanated from those newspapers that are more concerned about the success of the Progressive movement and the sordid aspirations of its leaders than about the welfare of the country. While it is not difficult to divine President Taft's motive it is nevertheless premature to indulge in querulous or any other kind of criticism. President Taft is in a position to get a broader view of the situation in Mexico than any other citizen of the United States. He is in a position to discern things that are not to be seen by others and to judge of their bearing on our country and of consequences that are likely to ensue. It is but just and reasonable to assume that out of the fullness of his knowledge he has been able to take a wise precaution against a possible crisis of some sort. The situation in Mexico is one that will bear watching, and it would be unwise on our part not to be prepared for whatever emergency might be developed. We must always be on the alert for an occurrence that might serve as a pretext for some foreign Power to challenge the principle of the Monroe Doctrine. That principle makes it incumbent on us to safeguard foreign interests in Mexico. And it would be folly for us to accept as final the dictum of President Diaz that the Government is strong enough for all purposes. Prima facie evidence to the contrary is to be found in the futile efforts so far made to put down an insurrection. On the other hand it would be absurd for us to consider the interests of the insurrectionists who after many months of guerrila fighting have been unable to give their cause the aspect of a genuine revolution or impart to it the dignity of a political convulsion.

Sylvia of the Suffragettes

The newspapers tell us that Miss Sylvia Pankhurst is known as the Joan of Arc of the English suffragettes. This designation excites one's curiosity. In what respect does this young woman resemble the beatified Maid of Domremy? From her photographs one may judge that she is fair to look upon, and from the expedients which she adopted in London to signalize her devotion to her propaganda it may be inferred that she is a militant maid with red blood in her veins and a great deal of self-assertion to carry her through emergencies, but of any other traits suggestive of resemblance to the heroine of Orleans we are not aware. And these traits are not peculiar to Miss Sylvia Pankhurst. If they are the most salient of her characteristics she might much more appropriately be styled the Carrie Nation of England. However there may be some reason for the appellation which the people of England have bestowed on Miss Pankhurst. They may regard her as a witch and therefore a brand for the burning. But calling her a Joan of Arc on this hypothesis must be repugnant to educated Englishmen who have come to regard the Maid of Domremy with a great deal of reverence. Whatever be the reason for calling Miss Pankhurst Joan of Arc it is to be hoped that if not from Heaven she will at least try to derive inspiration from the career of the chaste maid to whom she has been likened.

The Shack Nuisance

Our esteemed contemporary, the Chronicle, is very much incensed against the municipal authorities for tolerating the so-called shack nuisance. It is certainly an outrage that the owners of shacks should have been so long permitted to disfigure the heart of the city and receive the benefit that has accrued from the enterprise of their public spirited neighbors. The Chronicle suggests that as the Supervisors are suspiciously complaisant the civic bodies should employ able counsel to enforce the law. Which reminds us that we have an official attorney in the person of the Hon. Percy Long, a gentleman who spends a great deal of his time vindicating his ardent devotion to the welfare of the city, and who looks forward to a long and prosperous employment in the service of the people. Mr. Long dearly loves to enforce all laws affecting the public interests, and with him on the job there can be no necessity for the employment of able counsel by the civic bodies. That Mr. Long has not already proceeded against the wealthy shack owners is due neither to timidity nor negligence. Indeed the probability is that Mr. Long has been long meditating on the question of the most advantageous course to pursue, and probably his meditations have been interrupted from time to time by considerations touching the next political campaign. For Mr. Long realizes that it is as important for the people that he should be kept in office as that he should enforce the law.

The Shocking of Gates

Speaking of the Throop bill Senator Gates says, "There hasn't been a dirtier piece of lobbying in twenty years before this Legislature than has been done by the aristocrats of culture." And Senator Bell gives this testimony: "I went through the most corrupt session of the Legislature in years, but I never knew the Southern Pacific lobby in its worst days to put on the screws or conduct a lobby in a more offensive way than did the opponents of this bill." How the reformers do squeal when they get dosed with their own medicine! When things are going their way the end always justifies the means, as was illustrated when John D. Works was elected United States Senator. The paramount principle of down-to-date reform is that the greater good must be advanced at any cost, and it is assumed by reformers as a self-evident proposition that they alone are competent to determine what constitutes this sacred and eternal object of patriotic endeavor. And so the "aristocrats of culture" being against the Throop bill it followed that the defeat of that bill was essential to the advancement of the greater good; for reform and culture are synonymous in California. Every high-brow from President Wheeler to John D. Barry is a reformer. And consequently if as Senator Gates says, "Men were threatened with loss of position, with business ruin and with bank foreclosure," why should Senator Gates object? Senator Gates is a reformer and is bound by the rules of the game. If he is shocked by the tactics employed at Sacramento he ought to come to San Francisco and learn of some of the things that have been done for the advancement of the greater good by the high-minded gentlemen who accomplished the wonderful, amazing transformation of that present embodiment of all the abstract principles of reform, the Hon. Hiram Johnson. If Senator Gates had been trained in the San Francisco atmosphere of reform he would now be unshockable.

Organized Labor at Sacramento

Organized Labor has fared pretty well at the hands of the Johnson administration. It is the only special interest that was given the glad hand at Sacramento, and it lost no opportunity of taking advantage of the profound concern and warm friendship that its interests enlisted. If some of its measures were beaten it was not because of a lack of sympathy but rather of timidity. One of the few beaten measures was that which was designed to exclude the militia from this labor-ridden city in the event of a bloody strike. And that measure was not exactly beaten. It was merely smothered to death, this method being adopted for the benefit of those legislators who had not the courage either to support or oppose it. The leaders of organized labor were not greatly distressed at their failure to get that measure on the statute books, since they have the situation in this city pretty well in hand anyway. They were easily appeased with the assurance that a bill would be passed prohibiting the employment of women for more than eight hours a day. Ostensibly this bill was advocated out of concern for working women. In truth it was adopted for the purpose of driving women out of employment. The power of organized labor was shown by the celerity with which Colonel Weinstock's career as a lobbyist was brought to a close. Colonel Weinstock is one of the pets of the Administration. Few men have greater influence than he with Governor Johnson. Colonel Weinstock is one of the leaders of the goo-goo movement in this State. And the Colonel went to Sacramento to become the proud father of a compulsory arbitration law. The Colonel is a passionate prophet of compulsory arbitration. He is so infatuated with the principle of compulsory arbitration that he is like the Englishman who invented a scheme for wiping out the national debt. He is so full of his subject that he is a veritable political homily personified. He affirms that there were only three great men in the world, and one of them invented compulsory arbitration. And doubtless expecting to be the fourth by making arbitration compulsory in California he went to Sacramento and right into the house of his friends and submitted to them his grand scheme for the abatement of industrial strife and the perpetuation of peace. But alas! the leaders of Organized Labor would have none of it. Well aware are they that compulsory arbitration would banish the walking delegate to innocuous desuetude. The Colonel received his quietus on the first rattle out of the box.

A Progressive Idea

Out of the deliberations of that profoundly wise group of men known as the Commonwealth Club are evolved some curious ideas which are always quickly transmitted to the editorial sanctum of the Chronicle and thence to the printed page. And among the ideas evolved in this club is one that has the persistency of a tune played on a barrel-organ. This idea has warped and enslaved the mind of one of the Commonwealthers, an amiable, sincere gentleman who writes readable editorials for the Chronicle. As Cicero says of study, it follows him into the country, it stays with him at home, it sits with him at breakfast and goes out with him at dinner. We allude to the idea that the criminal law should be simplified by the extinguishment of all technicalities. The realization of this idea is the Chronicle writer's hobby. Among his friends he will declaim about it by the hour, in support of it he will argue himself black in the face. And yet this enthusiastic theorist who discusses law with the dogmatism that is characteristic of those who are commonly most mistaken knows no more of the science of the law than a hog knows of the precession of the equinoxes. He knows only that the system of justice has not attained perfection, that the intricacies of the law are favorable to men accused of crime, and that justice occasionally miscarries, and therefore he would revive the practices of the days of Lord Jeffreys. Discussing the Ruef case the other day he took occasion to expatiate on his favorite theory in the usual way and in the course of his homily on the evil of technicalities he said many things that were not so. For example he said that Ruef "made a general confession in open court; and the evidence of his guilt is conclusive in every way." Now Ruef never did confess the crime charged against him in the indictment on which he was convicted; nor is the evidence of the guilt alleged in that indictment conclusive. The Court of Appeal said that it was and recited the evidence that was conclusive, but was obliged subsequently to insert in the record a statement to the effect that what was said in the decision to have been proved had not been proved at all. Another specimen of the Chronicle writer's inaccuracy is this: "The surest way for an innocent man to escape is to go as quickly as possible to a trial on the merits of his case." Anybody familiar with the history of criminal jurisprudence knows that there are many circumstances in which an innocent man may not hope for acquittal except he succeed in delaying his trial. Many an innocent man would have been hanged had he rushed to trial on the merits of his case while misguided public opinion was at white heat. Another specimen of inaccuracy is this: "It is of no consequence whether his accuser is or is not biased." It may be of the most vital consequence if his accuser is biased, especially if, as has been the case, the prosecuting attorney should happen to be the hireling of the accuser, and the judge on the bench his puppet with no conscientious scruple against permitting the prosecuting attorney to threaten the jury with summary punishment at the hands of the mob. "The only proper question before a criminal court," says the Chronicle enthusiast, "is 'Did or did not the accused do what he is charged with doing?'" This assertion is not to be challenged. The object of all trials is to ascertain the truth, but there must be some mode prescribed for its ascertainment. The law does prescribe the mode just as the rules of grammar prescribe the mode of expressing thought. When the rules of grammar are violated there is danger of the thought being misinterpreted. And likewise when the legal mode of ascertaining the truth is violated the result may not be in accordance with desire. This legal mode is not perfect. Even when followed with precision it does not always lead to the discovery of truth. But it is the product of ages of study, investigation and experiment, and a better substitute is not to be contrived offhand. Hardly likely is it to be improved upon in the manner recommended by the representative of the Commonwealth Club on the Chronicle staff, the writer who being obsessed with the idea that technicalities are an abomination, classes them all as quibbling niceties. He thinks that when a defendant is granted a new trial because the trial judge violated some fundamental principle, such, for example as the principle that excludes hearsay testimony, the "technicality" is on a par with an objection to a split infinitive. So narrow is this gentleman's mental horizon that he cannot see the importance of principle at all. Here we have a philosopher who pins his faith to expedient. Beyond his comprehension is the necessity of requiring that legal justice shall take effect through well defined general rules applicable to all men. He would have reposed in every court a vague discretion to administer what might appear to be moral justice, the kind that only the Almighty can administer. What would be the result of this system of justice. It would make a farce of the jury trial and put us back to the days of Lord Jeffreys. The trial judge would have autocratic power over the life and liberty of every citizen who had the misfortune to be accused of crime. For it seems our amiable dogmatist of the Chronicle would not be content with giving every trial judge the discretion to conduct every inquiry according to his whim. He says: "No appeal of any kind on any point should be permitted in any criminal case except upon the written statement of the trial or appellate court that there is reasonable doubt whether the convicted person committed the crime." What is meant by this is not clear. Application to the appellate court for a written statement that there is a reasonable doubt is in itself an appeal, and if there is a reasonable doubt of a man's guilt then he is entitled to a new trial. But if the rules of evidence are to be disregarded there will seldom be room for reasonable doubt. You can prove a Saint guilty of all the sins in the calendar if you try him as you see fit.

An Act of Leniency

The Boughten Bulletin platitudinizing with smug solemnity on the incarceration of Abe Ruef, admits that "The Prosecution" offered him "a measure of immunity," and says, "It is a singular circumstance that the policy for which 'The Prosecution' was most savagely criticised was this act of leniency toward Abe Ruef." A singular circumstance indeed! And yet the Boughten Bulletin and its masters surrounded the immunity transaction with something of the mystery and secrecy that tradition attaches to the coy fountains of the Nile. If the noble prosecutors were not sensible of the savage criticism that the granting of immunity to Abe Ruef would evoke why did they deceive the public for nearly a year? Judge Dunne at the behest of the prosecutors postponed the sentence of Abe Ruef from week to week and from month to month, and all the while nobody dared tell the public the truth. When finally the explosion came and we heard the story of the midnight meeting participated in by two judges, of the written immunity contract designed for public deception in the event of discovery and the verbal immunity contract witnessed by two clergymen, then The Prosecution pleaded that they had agreed to give Ruef only "a measure of immunity." What measure of immunity did they intend to give him? This is something they have never told us, and perhaps it is just as well they never did, for their conscience they stained often enough, and their reputation for veracity was so badly damaged that no person of ordinary intelligence believed anything they said. It was mainly because of their repeated deceptions that they became utterly discredited. They had appealed to the public for support, for sympathy, for endorsement of everything they did howsoever at variance with justice or decency, and yet they did not dare trust the public with full knowledge of their doings. When the people learned of the bargain with Ruef naturally they were indignant, for nobody ever had the impudence to plead in behalf of Ruef that he was a victim of temptation.

The prosecutors had professed from the beginning to be eager to punish the men who had tempted the weak, unfortunate public servants; and at the inception of their enterprise they were to be after Ruef, the Satan of the dominion of graft, first, last and all the time. They described him as the most unscrupulous villain in the history of American politics. He had seduced the Supervisors and extorted money from corporations by threatening to destroy their business, and so there was no doubt about the degree of his villainy or the depths of his infamy. Even Mr. Rudolph Spreckels had personal experience of Ruef's methods. As he himself has testified Ruef tried to tempt him by unfolding to him a grand scheme by which they could both make a ton of money. And yet Mr. Spreckels and his associates were willing to grant Ruef complete immunity. This we know because aside from all the testimony about the immunity contract there is the independent testimony of The Prosecution's own witness, "Jim" Gallagher, to the effect that at his first meeting with Mr. Spreckels the latter told him he would be willing to give immunity to all the grafters including Ruef and Schmitz provided he could reach the higher-ups. It was only the higher-ups that Mr. Spreckels was after, but he didn't want the public to know. He knew that complete justice would be done by liberating Ruef and the whole gang of grafters if as a result he could send the higher-ups to jail, but he was afraid his conception of a square deal might not tally with the people's. And even to this day he considers it singular that he should have been savagely criticised for his act of leniency toward the man who debauched the city, the head, front and general director of the great carnival of graft.

Siftings from Many Sources

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over

By Robert McTavish

A Swat for San Francisco

The newspapers of Stockton and Sacramento are "all het up" over what they regard as a conspiracy of the San Francisco jobbers to "hog interior trade" by depriving interior towns of terminal rates. This "conspiracy," it seems, was launched at the Commercial Club in this city and the Cassius of the nefarious plot was none other than handsome William R. Wheeler, manager of the traffic bureau of the Merchants' Exchange. "It seems to be impossible," wails the Stockton Mail, "for San Francisco to learn that other communities on the Pacific Coast have possible reasons for existence besides contributing to the prosperity of the metropolis." The policy of the "conspirators" it stamps as "more than selfish; it borders on brigandage." Our jobbers the Mail calls "fat and smug," which is picturesque if not argumentative. The Sacramento Bee rallies to the fight with acidulous remarks about our "green-eyed jealousy." It quotes G. J. Bradley who runs the traffic bureau for the Sacramento merchants and manufacturers as saying that San Francisco is trying to enforce on its weaker sisters a "heads I win, tails I lose" arrangement. As an effort at enlivening the drowsy science of rate-making the controversy is a decided success.

The Battle of the Oysters

The Battle of the Oysters has been waged in London. The point at issue was this: Which is the better, the Blue Point or the Colchester native? An attempt to reach a decision was made at a luncheon at the Savoy Hotel, where both kinds of "luscious bivalves" were served to a jury consisting in equal parts of Americans and Englishmen. The Blue Points had retained for their case Newton Crane, an American lawyer who lives in the Temple. Mr. Guerney Benham, an English barrister, spoke a passionate and Hortensian oration in favor of the Colchester native. Mr. Crane's apologia for the American oyster was a sustained flight of emotional oratory. He pointed out above all things the adaptability of the American oyster. You could do anything with it. You could fry it, roast it, or scallop it, grill it, stew it and maitre d'hotel it. You could put it on horseback. Thus the Blue Point had the virtue of its race, the virtue of being able to fit itself to things, conditions and processes. All applauded his speech, for he spoke most forcefully. The English barrister then arose. His eagle eye glanced down the long corridors of time, along the avenue of the aeons, until it lighted upon the majestic form of Julius Caesar. Julius Caesar had come to Britain especially to eat oysters. He had never gone to Baltimore to eat an oyster. He had never gone near Blue Point. He had scorned the quiet harbor of Lynn Haven. He had never taken the trouble to see the rocks with saddles upon them. But Colchester natives he had "partaken of heartily." The learned gentleman magnanimously admitted that the Blue Point was palatable. At the conclusion of the debate a Philadelphia decision was rendered.

The Recall in Tacoma

Up in Tacoma where they have a commission form of government and where the women have the franchise, a number of the more militant members of the weaker sex got together recently to investigate the mayor. That unfortunate attended the meeting, probably because he couldn't escape doing so. But when the grill was getting too warm he made a hurried excuse about pressure of business and started for the door. But he wasn't quick enough. One of the women whom the Tacoma Ledger describes as "smiling but insistent," grabbed him by the coat lapel and led him back to the platform where he was grilled to a turn.

In Too Much of a Rush

Criticism of the University of California agricultural demonstration train comes from the San Bernardino "Sun." The "Sun" finds the train too suggestive of "twenty minutes for dinner" or Section Foreman Finnegan's "off again, on again, gone again" report. It seems that the train stayed in San Berdoo only two hours and in that time more than seven hundred people tried to see the exhibits and hear the lectures. "More or less of a farce," comments the "Sun." It quotes the university claims of excellence made for this "college on wheels" and continues:

Now that would be true, if the train could stay long enough in one place for agriculturists to really get the benefit of its work. But it doesn't. That seven hundred people crowded through in the brief space of time allotted to San Bernardino shows that they are interested and that the scientific side of farming has a hold on Californians. But all the education they are likely to get out of such brief stays is not likely to materially affect our methods.

An Old Story Retold

The Mrs. Partingtons of Portland have been trying to sweep the social evil out of the city. They have brought about the inevitable result—an invasion of the respectable residence districts by undesirables. The "Spectator" of Portland scolds the Portland Telegram for helping to precipitate the unpleasant situation:

Bitter is the complaint of the Telegram that the scarlet women of Portland, having been hounded from their rooms in a remote and isolated part of the city, are seeking quarters in the residence districts. What would the Telegram have? When it joined the "moral crusade" against these unfortunate creatures, and seconded the demand that they be driven from the part of the city that had been by general consent given up to them, did it think they would take poison, or drown themselves, or otherwise perish from the earth? Did the Telegram think that the lust and passion of the men who made them what they are were sated? Or did the Telegram think anything at all about the matter aside from the "story" feature of it, and how it could sensationalize a condition that is, unhappily, as much a part of the life of a city as is the rum shop or the moving-picture show?

He Differs from Sherman

According to John E. Boyd, a Civil War veteran residing in Berkeley, the famous March to the Sea was a good deal of a lark. Writing to the Berkeley Gazette to protest against certain moving pictures exhibited in Oakland and tending to prove Sherman's assertion that war is hell, Boyd says: I never saw but one house burned by our boys, and that was set on fire to drive out guerillas. I would not like the children who listened to my comrades on Lincoln day to imagine for a moment that we went down there to commit murder (unless it was chickens) and this was the "fowlest" crime we were guilty of, except that I did pass a Perry Davis pain killer label off on an old colored aunty as a fifty-cent Lincoln" shin-plaster," receiving one dozen eggs therefor. But, Mr. Editor, it would be a horrible thing if our rising generation, every time they see a man wearing a G. A. R. badge, should look on him as a sort of King Herod. I have met comrades who did not deny that they ate and relished mule meat on the march to the sea. In fact, one of the poets on the march wrote some verses which described the joys of eating a mule porterhouse, and every verse wound up as follows:

"The man who would kick at a steak off a mule
Is the biggest and d——est kind of a fool."

No dinner party is complete without the Italian-Swiss Colony's red or white TIPO. It is California's choicest table wine and is popular throughout the United States.

Varied Types

XIII—GAVIN McNAB

By Edward F. O'Day

Everybody remembers what a hectic celebration the town had that night in November, 1905, when Eugene E. Schmitz was elected mayor for the third time. With the aid of the new voting machines the fusion ticket had been completely routed and Ruef's painteaters rode into office on the crest of the wave of popular opinion. The tenderloin went wild with delight, the saloons were jammed with thirsty politicians, there were parades, bands and firecrackers. To add to the excitement of the night the Chronicle tower caught fire and wonderful coppery beacons flamed in the sky while thousands of men and women stood around and enjoyed the spectacle. Ruef was a busy man that night. He was master of the revels and his remarkable brain devised all sorts of insults to the fallen foe. Among other things he gave orders for a funeral procession and to the strains of the Dead March from Saul a drunken mob of his wardheelers marched through the downtown streets, finally depositing a coffin on the threshold of the Occidental Hotel. Gavin McNab lived at the Occiental and the coffin was meant for him. Next day McNab met Ruef.

"I see you left an empty coffin on the doorstep of my hotel last night," said McNab.

Ruef grinned.

"Well," continued the Democratic boss, "the events of the next two years will determine who is to fill it, you or I."

This story is not told for the purpose of jibing at a broken man. Far be it from me to strike at Ruef, now that he is down. I simply repeat the incident for its bearing on Gavin McNab's career. Many bosses have come and gone during his years of political leadership. Not a few have regarded him as Ruef regarded him. But like Ruef they have gone to their political coffins, while Gavin McNab has yet to catch the personal note in the strains of the dead march. Some day, perhaps at no distant date, he will retire from politics, but he will retire because he has exhausted politics, not because politics has exhausted him. When the time comes to encoffin his political career, Gavin McNab will perform the obsequies himself.

If mere defeat could destroy the power of a political leader Gavin McNab would have been destroyed years ago. No political dominance of equal duration was ever crushed as frequently as McNab's. He has probably lost as many elections as he has won. But like the demigod, every time he has been felled he has risen with renewed vigor; and many of the victories won by his opponents have been Pyrrhic victories. Looking back over his career it is not too much to say that his defeats have done him as much honor as his triumphs; sometimes more, for a triumph involves difficult responsibilities from which a defeat is happily free.

What is the secret of his continued leadership through lean years and fat? It is no secret. Anybody who knows Tammany in New York or the Democratic organization in San Francisco can explain it.

"I introduced absolute local autonomy in the party," said McNab. "District leadership was district leadership in fact, not in theory. The men elected to office were the sole judges of patronage and they divided the patronage among the districts in accordance with the best judgment of the district leaders. If a district could not supply a good man for a job, the job did not go to a bad man in that district; it went to a good man in some other district. Sometimes when the time came to distribute patronage I did not have the disposal of a single place. I was the leader, it is true, but my leadership was an abstract thing. That's why my political enemies couldn't destroy it. You can't destroy an abstraction."

Being a Scotchman with the Scotch leaning toward metaphysics McNab probably lays a little too much emphasis on the "abstract idea." Even the Tammany system of district autonomy demands something more than "abstract" leadership in the boss and the Tammany system, owing to the exceedingly healthy opposition of the Republican and Union Labor organizations, has never been perfected in San Francisco. Hence it has frequently happened that McNab's "abstract" leadership has been transformed to bossing of the concrete description—and reinforced concrete at that. And when his bossing displeased the district bosslets, district leadership became a figment of fancy and McNab landed on the recalcitrants like a load of bricks.

That is why he has so many political enemies within and without the party.

"I am the only Democrat in the city who could bring out the entire vote," he used to say. "If I ran for office my friends would vote for me and my enemies would go to the polls in full force just to show what they thought of me."

McNab likes to talk about his friends.

"I wouldn't exchange the friendships I have made in politics for anything in the world," he says. "That is the best thing about politics. It is the greatest panorama of human nature we have. Men are men in politics; the shams don't count—they strike your sense of the ridiculous at once. But with the real men you form real friendships. You come to believe profoundly in human nature. You find that it is a splendid thing, especially among the poor, the working people. After the associations of politics the associations of so-called 'social life' have no attraction for you. And if your interest in politics is impersonal, as mine has been; if you seek no office, you learn to laugh at the foibles and the weaknesses. You become an optimist. I am a profound optimist."

Perhaps more than most men Gavin McNab has been the master of his own fate, and yet he simply drifted into politics. On his father's sheep ranch at Largo in Mendocino County—an old Spanish grant which the McNab brothers have preserved intact through all these years—the boy devoured Stuart Mill and Adam Smith, Gevons and Cairnes, Ricardo and Bastiat. He had a district school "education" and a passion for political economy. When he came to this city at the age of twenty-one he brought little else with him, except abstemious habits — he never drinks or smokes—and a manful determination to get ahead. The tariff was the great political issue of the time and in the intervals of his work as a clerk at the Occidental Hotel he wrote tariff articles for the old Alta. The articles attracted attention and he was gradually drawn into Democratic politics. He made the acquaintance of E. B. Pond and when Pond became a candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor McNab went to the convention at San Jose as a Pond man. Pond was nominated over the opposition of Chris Buckley who, however, sold out his strength in the general election and insured the victory of Stanford. Naturally the Pond men were sore and with McNab as one of their leaders they broke Buckley's strength in the next campaign.

"When I slapped the idol in the face," says McNab, "everybody waited to see me drop dead, but I didn't drop dead and gradually the papers took up the fight."

The Wallace Grand Jury also took it up and although Buckley and Sam Rainey won two elections after that, the shepherd and his "lambs" never regained dominance. The victorious insurgents quarreled, as victorious insurgents always do, but McNab maintained his leadership campaign after campaign and the Democratic organization controlled most of the patronage offices in San Francisco until Schmitz was elected for the third time and swept the painteaters with him. To review the history of that control and of McNab's part in it would require a volume. But McNab summarizes it fairly enough.

"Sometimes we elected pharisees to office, but never a crook. And speaking of pharisees, when Taylor was elected he told some of my friends that he was thinking of appointing me poundmaster. I sent him word that he wouldn't dare do it because he knew that I would shut up his doggerel."

McNab had studied law as well as tariff schedules at the Occidental and during his years of political activity he gradually built up a fine practice.

"But while I was active in politics," he says, "I never took a case for a public service corporation."

Even now he doesn't take such cases within this city, for he thinks it would be ethically in-

The Lie

By Leonid Andreyev (From the Russian)

"You lie! I know you lie!"

"Why are you shouting? Is it necessary that others should hear you?"

And here she also lied, for I was not shouting, but speaking in a very low voice, while I held her hand in mine. It was almost in a whisper that the venomous word "lie" hissed from me like a small viper.

"I love you," she continued, "and you must believe me. Does that not convince you?"

And she kissed me. But when I wished to take her into my arms she was no longer there. She had left the dimly-lighted corridor and I followed her to the bright salon where the merry feast was going on. How can I know where it took place? She told me to come there, and I came, and watched the happy couples whirling around the whole night long. No one came near me, no one spoke to me; and I, a total stranger, sat in a corner not far from the musicians. The mouth of a large brass trumpet was directed straight at me and someone imprisoned in it roared and broke out every two minutes in abrupt, coarse laughter: "Cho-Cho-Cho!"

At times I was approached by a white, perfumed cloud. It was she. I do not know how she managed to caress me so that no one would notice, but for one short second her shoulder would press mine, and for one short second I could, when I lowered my eyes, see a white decollete dress and a snow-white neck, and when I raised my eyes I saw her profile, such a white, stern and truthful profile as one sees sometimes on the statue of an angel who stands sunk in deep reverie over the grave of a forgotten man. And her eyes also I saw. They were large, beautiful and calm. Surrounded by its blue iris, the pupil of her eye was black, deep, impentrable. Gazing now into her eyes, I became conscious that never until now had I so deeply and terribly understood what "infinite" meant; never until now had I felt it so powerfully. With fear and pain I felt my whole life pass into her eyes, ray-like, until I became a stranger to myself, empty and mute—almost dead. Then she left me, taking my life along with her, to dance with some tall, proud, handsome man.

I have studied every detail of this man; his style of foot-wear and the width of his shoulders —while he, with his indifferent, unseeing look, pressed me as if into the wall, and I became as flat and immaterial to the eye as the wall itself.

When the lights were being extinguished I approached her and said:

"It is time to depart; I shall escort you home."

"But I am going with him," she said, as if surprised that I should not have known it, and she pointed to the tall, handsome man, who was not looking at us. Then she took me into a room where there were no people and kissed me.

"You lie," I said in a low, very low voice.

"We shall see each other today. You must come," she replied.

From behind the tall roofs appeared a greenish, frosty morning, as I was returning home. On the whole street there were only we two—the coachman and I. He sat with head bent and face hidden in his large collar, and I sat behind him with head bent and face hidden almost to the eyes.

The coachman was sunk in his own thoughts and I was sunk in mine, and there, beyond the thick walls of all these houses, were sleeping thousands of people, and they had their own dreams and thoughts. I was thinking of her and her lies. I thought of death, and it seemed to me that these dimly lighted walls had already witnessed my death, which was why they looked so cold and straight. I do not know of what they were dreaming, those who were hidden by the thick walls of the houses; but then, neither did they know of what I thought and dreamed.

And so we rode over the long, straight streets, and the morning rose from behind the roofs, and all around us everything was motionless and white. A scented white cloud approached me; straight into my ear laughed someone who was imprisoned in a large brass instrument—"Cho-Cho-Cho!"

II.

She lied. She did not come out to me and I waited for her in vain.

A gray twilight was descending from the darkened sky, and I did not know when the twilight became merged into evening and the evening into night. I only thought it was but one long night. With the same step, the monotonous, measured step of long waiting, I walked to and fro. I did not approach the tall house in which my beloved lived, nor its glass door which looked yellowish from under the sheet-iron cornice, but I continued passing with the same measured step on the opposite side of the street—to and fro, to and fro. My eyes never left the glass door, and when going in the opposite direction I often stopped and turned my head. Then the falling snow beat me in the face, pricking it as if with so many sharp needles—and these sharp, cold needles were so long that they reached my very heart and inoculated it with the sadness and anger of helpless expectation. From the light north to the dark south a cold wind blew freely. Whistling gaily over the icy roofs he came tearing along and beat my face with sharp, tiny bits of snow, and drummed over the glass panes of the empty lamps in which a lone, weak, yellowish light was swaying, as if shivering with cold. And I felt sad for the solitary light which lived only at night, and thought that soon life would wholly vanish from this street; I would go away and only the snow-flakes would fly through the empty space and the yellowish light would continue to tremble and sway, in solitude and in cold.

I waited her and she did not come. And it seemed to me that the yellowish light and I were very like to each other, only that my lamp was not empty. Sometimes people appeared in the space which I measured with my steps. Noiselessly rising behind my back, dark and tall, they passed me, growing mistier and mistier, like apparitions, and then suddenly vanished round the corner of the large, white building. And once more they came out from around the corner, passed by me, and slowly melted in the gray distance, covered with the silently falling snow-flakes. Muffled up, formless, mute, they resembled one another and myself, and it seemed to me that many people walked to and fro, as I did, waited, froze, and were as mute as I; and they were thinking only of that which interested themselves alone, and were enigmatic and sad.

I awaited her, and she did not come. I do not know why I did not shout, or weep with pain. I do not know why I laughed, rejoiced, and pressed my fingers so that they felt like claws, and it seemed as if I was holding something small and venomous between them, something that hissed like a viper—the lie. It wriggled in my hand, and bit at my heart, and my head was reeling from the venom. Everything was a lie. The boundaries between the future and the present, between the present and the past, had vanished. The boundary had vanished between the time when I did not exist and the time when I began to live, and I thought that I had always lived—or that I had not lived at all. And always, before I came into existence and after, when I had come to life—she had reigned over me, and the thought that she lived in the flesh and had a name, and that there was a beginning as there would be an end to her existence, seemed very strange to me. She had no name, and she was always the one who lied, the one who forever compelled men to wait for her but never came. And I do not know why, but I laughed, and the sharp needles pierced me to the very heart and someone who was kept imprisoned laughed straight into my ear: "Cho-Cho-Cho!"

On opening my eyes I saw the lighted windows of the tall house. With their blue-red tongues they were telling me in low tones:

"She is deceiving you; this very minute, while you are pacing the street alone, waiting and suffering, she, so beautiful, so brilliant, so false, is within there, listening to the whispers of the tall, handsome man who despises you. If you should break into that house and kill her, you would do a good deed, for you would have killed the lie."

I pressed tighter the knife that I held in my hands, and replied with a laugh:

"Yes, I will kill her."

But the windows looked sadly at me, and sorrowfully added:

"You will never kill her—never; because the weapon you hold in your hand is as much a lie as are her kisses."

The mute shadows of those who also walked and waited had long since vanished, and in the cold space there remained only myself and the trembling tongues of flame inside the lonely street-lamps. The clock on the bell tower began to strike the hour and the melancholy, metallic sounds trembled and wept, flying into space and losing themselves in the maddeningly whirling snow-flakes.

I began to count the strokes and laughed: the clock had struck fifteen. The clock-tower was very old and the clock was also an old one, and though it showed the time correctly, it struck without count, and at times the old bell-ringer had to climb up and hold down the spasmodically beating little hammer. For whom did these melancholy sounds, trembling with old age and almost strangled by the frosty darkness, lie? How pitiful and foolish was this unnecessary falsehood!

And with the last lying stroke of the clock the glass door opened and shut, and a tall figure walked down the steps. I saw only his back, but I knew it, for I had seen it only yesterday, proud and contemptuous. I also recognized his walk; it was more self-assured now and lighter than last night. I too had often felt as self-assured when leaving that door—that is the way men walk who have been kissed only a moment before by a woman's lying lips.

III.

I threatened, I demanded, gnashing my teeth: "Tell me the truth!"

Perspective Impressions

Nat. Goodwin has another pretty leading lady and threatens to "come back." What a glutton for punishment!

In this darling Democracy we are gradually getting to the point where none will be without worries but the man who is broke.

The Boughten Bulletin, local representative of the La Follette-Garfield-Pinchot propaganda, charges that President Taft has conspired with President Diaz to maintain a despotism in Mexico. How like the methods of the defunct Graft Prosecution are the methods of the great syndicate that has been formed to rule or ruin!

Now that Ballinger is out does anybody know what he did that was wrong aside from exciting the hostility of Garfield and Pinchot?

If Jim Gallager comes back it would be a good idea to postpone the Calhoun case till 1915 and make it one of the Fair attractions.

It is said that T. R. is coming to California to greet the stork, to renew acquaintance as it were with a specimen of domestic fauna whose visits to the family of the great Prophet of race propagation are so infrequent that it deserves to be classified among the rarae aves.

Are they surfeited with self-felicitations? If so let's get busy.

So the Democrats are getting ready to besmirch Taft for doing what he concieved to be his duty as commander-in-chief of our military forces! This is perhaps what Champ Clark regards as the high water mark of statesmanship.

Mr. William R. Hearst demands that Arizona with its crazy Constitution be admitted to the Union. Mr. Hearst's demands do not receive at present the consideration they will receive when the recall is in operation all over the country. No wonder he's in favor of the recall!

The Spectator

They're Really Representative

The gentlemen who have come together for the purpose of "securing for the city for the next four years sound municipal government," may be depended upon to do the right thing according to the gospel of the Hon. James D. Phelan and the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels. How unsophisticated must the dear people appear to this "representative body of men" as they are styled by their chairman Mr. William J. Dutton! There are fifty of them, all intent upon finding a good man for Mayor "regardless of past political affiliation," and they expect us to believe that they gravitated together out of a common zeal for the welfare of the city. Let us go down the list and see what the political affiliations of some of them have been. First comes Curtis H. Lindley, a gentleman strongly in sympathy with all the civic activities of the Phelan twins, one of the pets of the Taylor dispensation. Appropriately he is followed by his friend Matt I. Sullivan, attorney for the Boughten Bulletin, conspicuous in the Father Crowley-Fremont Older coterie of public spirited citizens. Dr. Huntington comes next. The doctor was a member of the Taylor Board of Health. Charley Bentley of the suspicious canned fruits and the Spreckels cabal is on the list; also that most rectitudinous of men, Rolla V. Watt of the Phelan bank and his associate John T. Fogarty, a Phelanite by inheritance. And lo! and behold! Harris Weinstock, the dry-goods man, formerly a client of Hiram Johnson's and of the social set that boasts an Older, a Phelan and a Spreckels. Right after him comes Mr. O. K. Cushing, a really reputable and respected attorney with no discreditable past affiliations, but at present the attorney for Mr. Spreckels in his will contest. Not so well known in the legal profession is that other representative man Mr. Max Kuhl, who was slated for the Superior bench by Governor Johnson till organized labor scared his excellency into vetoing the bill increasing the judiciary. He is about as representative as Mr. J. B. Levison the insurance man who sticks pretty close to Phelan and Spreckels, and whose brother, Dr. Levison, is also one of the representative bunch. Somewhat more distinguished, but not more in sympathy with the twins are Mr. W. R. Wheeler, brother of Charley, Sheldon Kellogg who served the dear people under Taylor and also under Phelan, and Selah Chamberlain, who was treasurer of the Heney League or some kindred organization. There are others, but why go any further. One doesn't have to drink up the whole puddle to discover the nature of the water. But perhaps I ought to mention Horace Davis who while running for Mayor some years ago was so indiscreet as to hold a conference with Martin Kelly at the Poodle Dog restaurant. Surely these representative men ought to be able to pick out the right kind of Mayor, one with no strings tied to him, as chaste as a virgin and not less inaccessible to the blandishments of such gay cavaliers as Jimmy and Rudolph. But with all deference I beg leave to suggest by way of improving the quality of judgment, the names of more independent citizens the omission of which must be attributed to inadvertence. The names are E. P. E. Troy, Barclay Henley, Tommy Hickey and Willie Denman.

He Escaped with His Life

At one of the meetings held by the United Irish societies to prepare for the due celebration of St. Patrick's Day, Jim Brennan of the District Attorney's office was called upon for a few remarks. Being an orator with the courage of his eloquence Brennan launched into a speech that twisted the British lion's tail to the complete satisfaction of the assembled patriots. There were thunders of applause and when Brennan attempted to bring his oration to a close there were loud cries for more. Flushed with his triumph the young prosecutor plunged again into his theme and knocked a few more props from under the tottering British empire. Then he was reminded of the story of an Irishman and a negro. It bade fair to be a mighty good story and the audience hung upon his words, ready to unbottle their laughter when the point was reached. But the story was never finished. Brennan got along splendidly until he reached these words: "Then the coon said to the mick—" And when Brennan emerged from the hall with a mob of hooting, hissing Irishmen hot on his heels he thanked his stars that he hadn't been torn limb from limb.

Colonel E. D. Baker

In October of this year will occur the semi-centennial of the tragic end of Colonel Edward Dickinson Baker, and the people of Oregon, which State the great orator and soldier represented in the United States Senate, are to hold memorial services. It is proposed incidentally to remove Colonel Baker's remains from California and reinter them at Salem, Ore., because, as the Portland Oregonian says, Oregon is "the State that honored his name and reveres his memory." Commenting on this proposal the Call rightly says that Baker's connection with Oregon was exceedingly brief, that he was in no real sense an Oregonian, and that it is evident he considered himself a Californian from the fact of his having named the regiment he raised for the war the "California Volunteers." The truth is that Baker lived in Oregon only a year when he was elected to the Senate and that he was in the Senate but a few months when he took to the field. But even though he could be considered an Oregonian there is very good reason, a sentimental reason, for not removing his remains. For Baker's remains do not rest in Mountain View cemetery in Oakland, as the Call says, but in Laurel Hill cemetery in the shadow of Lone Mountain, and that cemetery was dedicated by the distinguished soldier and statesman. Colonel Baker was interred in Laurel Hill with imposing ceremonies on December 11, 1861. Thomas Starr King delivered the funeral oration, saying among other things: "We have borne him now to the home of the dead, to the cemetery, which after fit services of prayer, he devoted in a tender and thrilling speech, to its hallowed purposes." So there is something of historical association between Colonel Baker and Laurel Hill cemetery, and there is besides as a reason for letting his remains rest where they are the circumstance that it was by direction of his widow, who survived him but a few years and is buried in the same grave, that the body was brought to San Francisco for interment in the cemetery which he dedicated.

A Fragment

The dedication of Laurel Hill cemetery was a notable event in the history of San Francisco. The whole city turned out to witness the ceremonies which lasted with intermissions from 11 a. m. till sunset. The speech that Colonel Baker delivered on that occasion was not preserved though it was said to be most impressive. All that remains of it is this paragraph:

"Perhaps it may be well to acknowledge as a principle the great fact of immortality. No man desires annihilation. No man, whatever be his faults or his crimes, is willing to go into endless night; and when we come here, however loath we may be to stand in the Divine Presence, we recognize the fact that we are immortal, and the truth peals like eternal thunder in our ears, 'Thou shalt live forever!' With these thoughts we dedicate this spot. Here future generations, in long and solemn procession, shall bring warriors who have given their lives to their country; statesmen remembered by the liberty they helped to create and the institutions they aided to perfect. Here shall be brought the poet, who, buoyant, passed through sea and land, through earth and sky, and vale and river, penetrating the affections and accomplishing the refinement of men. The projector—worn with toil and grey with thought—leaving monuments to his fame and memorials of his greatness, here, too, shall come to end his life; and, too, the tender maiden, smitten in early blossom; and the little child, the pledge of love, to whose grave the aching heart shall oft repair to weep and pray."

His Flight for Life

Still another reason may be urged for not permitting the removal of Colonel Baker's remains; a cogent one, too. The reason is that the cenotaph over his grave serves as a precious reminder of the susceptibility of the multitude to the appeals of passion and prejudice. In the days of the Vigilantes Colonel Baker fled for his life from the frenzy of a maddened community. His life was in danger because he defended Charles Cora, the unfortunate wretch who killed William H. Richardson in a quarrel which Richardson precipitated. Despite the fact that Richardson was a man of considerable influence in the community a majority of the jury, which was composed of leading citizens, believing from the testimony that Cora shot Richardson in self-defense, voted for acquittal; yet while the prisoner was waiting for another trial the Vigilantes hanged him. The Vigilantes had stirred up feeling against Baker because of his bitter arraignment of the District Attorney who had dealt unfairly with the defendant, and the "Old Gray Eagle," as he was known even in those days, spread his wings and took flight to Nevada. With this incident in mind General John A. Collins, shortly after the death of Baker, wrote:

"Some years ago the people of San Francisco chased away an eloquent old man who took refuge in the mountains of Nevada. He was afterwards brought back from the sacrificial heights of Stone River, a mangled and speechless prophet of freedom, and fifty thousand people laid him tenderly on the altitudes of Lone Mountain within hearing of the eternal dirges of the ocean—while his glorious words echoed and still echo in the valleys and mountains from the fountains of the San Joaquin to the sources of the Columbia: 'Years, long years ago, I took my stand for freedom, and where in youth my feet were planted, there my manhood and my age shall march.'"

Otis May Come

Once more it is rumored that General Harrison Gray Otis may come to San Francisco to start a newspaper. This time rumor has it that some of our public spirited citizens with a plenitude of coin have volunteered to back the enterprise with half a million dollars. There is probably nothing that San Francisco needs more than an aggressive, independent newspaper, subject to no influence save that of the best traditions of journalism, capable of honest, fearless and intelligent criticism of men and measures. No nobler object could engage the attention of public spirited citizens than that of reforming the parochial, vulgar journalism of San Francisco. The daily press is a public utility as essential as any other to the welfare of a community, and the press of San Francisco is years behind the time. It comprises the maximum of misinformation and the minumum of common sense. Our newspapers are conducted rather in the interest of individuals than in the interest of the people, and instead of being an aid to the discovery of truth through the medium of controversy they discourage discussion with the weapon of abuse. No newspaper can state a proposition of any kind without being vilified by one of its contemporaries; and for so many years has the practice of substituting calumny for argument been indulged by our press that all our dailies have been copiously and notoriously tarred with the same brush. Whether General Otis is the man to give us an ideal newspaper some of us may doubt, but that he can improve on the kind that preserves the present tone of this community must be the opinion of everybody who has read the Los Angeles Times.

George Bernard Shaw's Reporter

George Bernard Shaw has no abiding affection for newspapermen. He is willing to use them at all times for purposes of self-advertising, but he always makes it a point to speak unkindly of them, if he speaks of them at all. There is a newspaperman in G. B. S.'s play "The Doctor's Dilemma" which has just appeared in book form. Here is the way Shaw characterises him: "A cheerful, affable young man who is disabled for ordinary business pursuits by a congenital erroneousness which renders him incapable of describing accurately anything he sees, or understanding or reporting accurately anything he hears. As the only employment in which these defects do not matter is journalism (for a newspaper, not having to act on its descriptions and reports, but only to sell them to idly curious people, has nothing but honor to lose by inaccuracy and unveracity), he has perforce become a journalist, and has to keep up an air of high spirits through a daily struggle with his own illiteracy and the precariousness of his employment. He has a notebook, and occasionally attempts to make a note; but as he cannot write shorthand, and does not write with ease in any hand, he generally gives it up as a bad job before he succeeds in finishing a sentence." Shaw used to be a newspaperman himself and must be presumed to know the type he is sketching. Which raises an interesting question. If he writes thus of the newspaperman of conservative London town, what would he say of the American reporter?

A Costly Week of Faro Bank

There is in this city a certain man who belongs to the best clubs, has a splendid home in a fashionable part of town, a charming and clever wife in society and an income which places him beyond the reach of worry. Also he has a penchant for gambling; hence this story. Last season this man whose name I withhold for obvious reasons, spent a week at Santa Barbara where he made the acquaintance of a professional gambler who ran a "brace" faro bank. A "brace" faro bank, I explain for the uninitiate, is a faro bank which has been fixed for crooked play. Of course the San Francisco man did not suspect that the bank was crooked. He spent his week in Santa Barbara trying to beat the game and he lost with almost marvelous regularity. At the conclusion of a day's or a night's play the victim handed to the professional gambler his I. O. U. for the amount of his losses. When he was about to leave Santa Barbara he closed the transaction by writing a check to cover his I. O. U's. The check was for $16,000 and was duly cashed by the owner of the "brace" faro game.

A Case of Blackmail

If the incident had closed there, it would have been an ordinary one not worth retailing, but it didn't. It is part of the gambling code that when a loser pays his I. O. U's. he does not ask for the return of the memoranda of indebtedness. It is regarded as a matter of course that the person from whom he has borrowed will destroy them as soon as they are covered by check or cash. The rule is a loose one from a banker's viewpoint, but gamblers have a strict ethical system of their own and the rule works satisfactorily with but few exceptions. Our San Franciscan encountered one of the exceptions. The faro dealer did not destroy his I. O. U's. He kept them and a few days ago, being hard up, sent word to the San Francisco man that he wanted payment on them to the extent of $12,000. It was quite useless for the San Franciscan to protest that he had already paid $12,000 and more; equally useless to point out that he had the negotiated check from his bank as a receipt. The faro dealer simply answered that he held the I. O. U's. and wanted the money. Now what is the man going to do? He feels that on account of his social and business connections he cannot endure the publicity of a lawsuit; and the faro dealer threatens to sue. He is willing to have some well known gambler arbitrate the claim. But he is afraid that the best he will be able to do will be to compromise with the blackmailer for a part of the amount demanded.

Hopkins on Kent

There are not many students of literature that appreciate the value of the Congressional Record. Few readers ever think of going to its files for edification, instruction or entertainment. Yet the Congressional Record is the great American classic. The men who have contributed to its pages, considered in bulk, have taken all knowledge for their province, and such is the variety of subject, of thought and expression to be found therein, that the massive volumes appeal to all tastes, to every species of curiosity. The Congressional Record is not dull or insipid. There is a breeziness and hilarity, a gay irresponsibility and abandon about it which is perfectly delightful. The other day, as is my custom, I took a cursory glance at my favorite classic and I came upon something of biographic interest. It was with reference to the Hon. William Kent, reformer, formerly of Chicago, now of the Second California district. Back in 1906 Congressman Kent who was then a private citizen of Chicago sent a letter to Senator Tillman informing him about frenzied finance as practiced by the National Banks. It was read in the Senate. Thereupon this contribution from Senator Hopkins, the man whose seat is now occupied by Senator Lorimer: "Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina illustrates as perfectly as it ever has come under my observation the saying of the old English poet:

'A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian Spring.'

I am sure if the Senator from South Carolina instead of being misled by the statement of Billy Kent and some newspaper statements that are equally irresponsible, had gone to leading citizens, etc., etc." In the course of his remarks Senator Hopkins also said: "I do not go to men like Billy Kent. I wish the Senator knew him as well as I know him. I wish he knew the financial and civic standing of Billy Kent as well as I know it. If he did I do not believe he would have read the letter that he has read here today."

voted to the great American classic. For perhaps it might have been worth while to investigate the Chicago record of this millionaire reformer who spent a large fortune in the last campaign to elect himself to Congress. Mr. Kent has played the game of politics in California like a skilled veteran. Establishing his home over in Marin county where he invested considerable money the eyes of the populace were on him from the moment of his arrival. He bought Redwood Canyon and presented it to the nation, and was eulogized for his great generosity by President Roosevelt. It was said at the time that by having the property converted into a national park he outmaneuvred a water company with which he was having some difficulty, but nevertheless he achieved the reputation of a public spirited citizen. Then he allied himself with the San Francisco regenerators, and figured as a member of Mayor Taylor's celebrated whitewash committee appointed for the purpose of giving the Spreckels' cabal a certificate of character. Having oodles of money he was able to cultivate the affections of the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League by contributing liberally to their funds, and when finally he let it be known that it would please him to go to Congress his friends felt that it was an act of great-condescension on his part to become a candidate. And so he ran, and spent his money like a drunken sailor, and today he is one of the shining lights of the great Progressive movement. Not a bad fellow is Billy Kent, whatever may have been his civic record in Chicago. He is above all things a good spender, and he will certainly make as good a Congressman as his predecessor.

Self-Revelation at Sacramento

At this writing there are no symptoms of nostalgia at Sacramento. Nobody is in a hurry to go home, a circumstance that enables us to gauge the calibre of the men who are tinkering the affairs of government for the indulgent, complaisant people of California. The most important men, the chief actors in the Legislature, are lawyers; of the Senate fifty per cent are members of the bar, and they have so little practice they can afford to dawdle away their time at Sacramento. Consider how much ability is likely to be found among all those lawyers who have so few clients that it doesn't matter much how long they stay away from home. No wonder they want the recall applied to the judiciary. Nearly every one of them being a rank failure in his profession feels that possibly he might improve his lot could he but render the courts more subservient to the mob which he has proved himself capable of conciliating. Consider also how unlikely it is that any man who is not a professional politician would fritter away his time—three months of it—in the company of such feeble intellects as are now assembled at the capital. There are gentlemen of leisure and successful business and professional men who can afford to devote much time to public business, but they are not bloviating and prancing in the limelight along with the Caminettis, the Finns, the Hurds and the Shanahans.

They're Waiting for Teddy

I am told, but I do not know how true it is that the Legislature will not adjourn till after Teddy Roosevelt's arrival in Sacramento. According to my informant the Administration wishes to have the Colonel address the Legislature in the language of encomium and pay the tribute of his approval to the gallant patriots who have sown the seeds of reform in this Progressive commonwealth. Which means that the taxpayers are to go on for weeks paying out several hundred dollars a day that they may get the benefit of the sage counsel that none but the Omniscient One of Sagamore Hill can disseminate. Assuming that the Legislature is not to adjourn till Teddy has had his say I will take the liberty of suggesting to the chaplains that they close the session with the following invocation from St. Luke II:

"Lord, now let thy servant depart in peace according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before all the people,—a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people."

The Poulsen Wireless Corporation

The advent of the Poulsen Wireless Corporation into the commercial field in the near future has caused considerable interest to be taken locally in the affairs of the corporation. Favored with a system of wireless transmission that can be operated over the land or the water and at all times of the day or night and in any kind of weather and backed by as strong a directorate as any California corporation could boast of, the Poulsen Wireless Corporation is rapidly gaining recognition as a prospective serious competitor of the present telegraph companies that rely on wires to carry on their business.

The officers and directors of the Poulsen Wireless Corporation are composed of the following well known and highly respected gentlemen: Beach Thompson, E. W. Hopkins, Chas. D. Marx, J. Henry Meyer, Geo. A. Pope, S. E. Slade and Chas. R. Bishop, all of whom are directors. Mr. Beach Thompson is president, Mr. E. W. Hopkins is Vice-president, and Mr. H. P. Veeder is Secretary and Treasurer.

Before the corporation was actually formed the above gentlemen spent over a year's time and a large amount of money in investigating the scope and validity of the Poulsen patents and also in demonstrating the commercial value of the same. When these matters were thoroughly proven to be satisfactory and practical the Poulsen Wireless Corporation was then put before the public.

The Poulsen Wireless Corporation has stations at present in operation in the following cities: San Francisco, Sacramento, Stockton, Palo Alto and Los Angeles, California, and El Paso, Texas. It is now building stations in San Diego, California, and in Fort Worth, Texas, the instruments for these two cities having been completed and shipped. Another station will also be ready in Honolulu in about a week's time. The Corporation has also a laboratory at Palo Alto, where it has instruments for ten more stations well along toward completion, which, when completed, and set up, will make a total of 19 stations.

The corporation has already arranged for a large amount of regular business and when 12 stations are equipped it can commence business on a profitable basis and continue increasing its net revenue as rapidly as new stations are erected in other cities. The north Pacific cities, such as Seattle, Portland, Tacoma, and Spokane have been selected for stations in the near future and with twelve cities on the Pacific Coast in operation, the company's earnings would be $10,400 per month, from business already secured, with an operating cost of not to exceed $5,000 per month.

Stations are also planned for the large cities on the Atlantic side such as New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Washington and Baltimore and with intermediate stations at cities like Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati and Denver, the Corporation will be in a position to transact a trans-continental business on a very profitable basis. It is calculated that this will be accomplished within about six months.

In order to insure a conservative and consistent management of the business of the Corporation, a Voting Trust Agreement has been entered into by holders of the majority of the, stock, which stock will be voted by three trustees for a period of 15 years, unless the agreement be abrogated earlier. Ample provision has been made for the abrogation of this trusteeship at any time it seems wise in the judgment of the trustees and stock owners. The gentlemen selected to act as trustees are E. W. Hopkins, J. Henry Meyer and Beach Thompson, with adequate provision for their successors in case of death or incapacity.

The Poulsen Wireless Corporation is organized under the laws of Arizona and has a capitalization of $25,000,000, divided into 250,000 shares of a par value of $100 each. To secure immediate funds to acquire property necessary for the purposes of the Corporation, to hasten the erection of other stations, and for the rapid extension of the Corporation's business, the Board of Directors have offered for sale 35,000 shares at a price of $35.00 per share, represented by Voting Trust Certificates. It is estimated that the funds thus provided will be sufficient to pay completely for the equipment in enough cities to give the Corporation a total number of 70 cities in the system.

These cities can be selected in such a manner as to yield $754,000 per annum. To earn this amount per annum from 70 cities would require the use of the stations for not to exceed 3 hours out of the 24, thus leaving seven-eighths of the capacity of the 70 stations for other business.

With 70 stations installed an estimate, thought to be conservative, of the capacity for work would exceed 5,000,000 messages per annum of an average length of 20 words, including addresses and signatures, which at a price of short distance messages, namely, 25 cents per message, would yield an additional $1,250,000 per annum. The total earnings from these two sources amount, therefore, to $2,004,000.

While it is very difficult to estimate accurately the cost of operating the above 70 stations and handling the above business, it is thought that this can be done for $754,000 per annum, which, if so, would give a net of $1,250,000. As the corporation, under the above conditions, would have no debt, the net earnings would equal 5 per cent on the total capital stock of the Poulsen Wireless Corporation.

It is the present judgment of the Board of Directors that after the earnings of the company have reached the above point, further extensions should be made from funds derived either from earnings, or from the sale of bonds.

In order to give an idea as to the advantages of the Poulsen Wireless System over the "spark" system which is used by other wireless companies, the following article, written by E. F. Elwell, a prominent expert on electrical matters, is quoted:

"When Marconi first startled the world in 1896 with the news that he had succeeded in transmitting telegraphic signals across a considerable distance without the aid of any intervening wire, both the public and the scientific world readily prophesied great achievements in this direction in the future. The scientific men, however, soon found, that even though Marconi had obtained good signals over 2000 miles that his system lacked a great deal of being a commercial system which could displace telegraphy by means of wires.

It soon developed that the signals fell off in intensity as night turned into day until finally in broad daylight they could only be heard over a fraction of the distance which was possible at night. In a similar way it was found that signals could be transmitted to much greater distances over water than over land. Another drawback of the system was the noise at the sending station which was not only distressing to the operator but betrayed what was being transmitted to any one within hearing.

The layman's first question naturally was how the different stations could be prevented from hearing or interfering with one another. This was explained as being done by "tuning."

A proper understanding of what is meant by "tuning" is necessary to appreciate the difficulty of doing this. Take the well known tuning fork. If a tuning work of a certain note, i. e. E, be struck near a number of other tuning forks, none of the tuning forks will respond except those which are tuned to the note C. These will vibrate in sympathy with the fork which was set in vibration and it may now be stopped and the other C forks will be found to be vigrating. Applied to wireless telegraphy it was thought that each station could be tuned to have a certain note, not necessarily audible, and that only such stations as were similarly tuned would respond to it. In practice this was found to work in a few cases but if one station was near to another and commenced sending, its vibrations were so powerful as to "force" the other station to vibrate even if it was not tuned to the same tune. If a pistol be fired near a piano, every string will vibrate, because it will be "forced" into vibration. Every one is familiar with the noisy crashing spark of Marconi's system of spark telegraphy. It resembles a pistol in its effect on surrounding stations. So great is the interference between all stations equipped with Marconi, or similar spark systems that stations have to agree on certain periods when one station should have the other to itself.

Summing up the defects of spark system it is seen that they do not work to advantage over land or in the day time, and the time available for work at night is decreased by the inability to prevent interference. Another point which has bearing on the commercial value of spark systems of wireless telegraphy is that of speed. To cover considerable distances a large amount of power has to be used and this suffices to keep the speed down to twenty-five words per minute.

When the art of wireless communication was well understood the foregoing defects were seen to be dependent on the amount of "damping" of the wireless waves.

While many systems were brought along Marconi or spark lines, it remained for Valdemar Poulsen to invent the only practical means for generating "undamped" waves. His discovery was hailed as being of great promise, especially on the "tuning" of stations so as to avoid interference. This it has done to a marked degree and as the acme of non-interference, wireless stations equipped with the Poulsen system are able to work with several other stations simultaneously. It was also found that the Poulsen system of undamped waves solved the problem of working over land and in the daytime, this being due to the continuous stream of energy instead of the intermittent stream from the spark systems. Recent results both in Europe and America have shown that distances up to twelve hundred miles over land comprising desert and high mountains are readily accomplished. Data over greater stretches of land are not yet available as the stations to test are not yet completed. The Poulsen system of undamped waves has also shown its ability to work as well in the daytime as at night, again probably due to the advantages of a continuous stream of energy.

When the question of speed is taken up, the Poulsen system of undamped waves again shows its superiority for due to the absence of the noisy and destructive spark, a speed of 245 words per minute has been obtained over a stretch of nine hundred miles. This rapid transmission of messages is accomplished by mechanical devices, both for sending and receiving, which the spark system cannot possibly use. This in addition to the delicate tuning that can be obtained is a further protection against messages being received by stations other than the ones intended.

It has been conceded by physicists that wireless telephony was only possible by means of undamped waves and the transmission of clear articulate speech has been accomplished by means of the Poulsen system over distances of upwards of 300 miles.

Harry Scott's Boxing Party

There can no longer be any doubt that the great old game of fisticuffs as reduced to scientific methods by the Marquis of Queensbury has entered polite society to stay. If the spirited goes in which Bobby Beresford, Tony Drexel and Tony Biddle indulged did not settle the matter, the last iota of doubt was removed by Harry Scott's boxing party last week. The idea of that boxing party was an inspiration which came to the tall son of Henry T. Scott when the usually satisfying delights of the tapestry room of the St. Francis had begun to pall upon him and upon his merry party of men and women. Only part of the story has been told; not all the guests were named in the newspaper account. In the list were Charles Willard, the aviator; Eugene Ely, the hero of the flight to the Pennsylvania, and Mrs. Ely; Mrs. J. C. Mars, the wife of the aviator who is flying in Japan amid the plaudits of royalty; a Mrs. Kitchener who was incorrectly listed in the papers as Mrs. Willard; W. A. Larned, the tennis champion; and William Farrel and J. C. Cowden, crack polo players. It was a gay assemblage and when the motor cars finally stopped at Equality Hall in Albion Avenue, Scott having been rebuffed in his attempts to hold the bouts at the St. Francis and Menlo hotels, the zest of what Jack London calls "the game" was tingling the blood of everybody.

She Acted as Second

The first bout between two pluguglies known as the "Panhandle Kid" and the "Mission Locomotive" lasted only three rounds and ended when the "Locomotive" ran over the "Kid," to the intense disgust of those who were backing the latter. The second bout was the piece de resistance. It was an argument between the "Pride of the Potrero" and the "Cow Hollow Hammer" and it continued for six bashing, slugging, bloody rounds. The play was rather heavy on this bout, one of the women betting three hundred dollars on the "Cow Hollow Hammer." At the end of the sixth round the "Hammer" was in a bad way. His wind was gone, his legs performed unsteadily and his face was covered with blood. The woman who was backing him became so excited that she climbed into the ring, seized a towel and began swinging it in front of his bleeding face, for all the world like an accredited second. And just at this interesting moment a policeman entered the hall. When he saw what was going on he whistled with amazement. When the assembled fight fans saw him they were panic-stricken. True to their instincts the aviators "went up in the air"; so did the wives of the aviators and the rest of the party. But the janitor of Equality Hall held a hurried conference with the policeman and the guardian of the law went out to seek instructions from headquarters. He wasn't quite sure whether he ought to "pinch the house" or not. When he returned all evidence of the evening's entertainment had vanished. The "Panhandle Kid," the "Mission Locomotive," the "Pride of the Potrero" and the "Cow Hollow Hammer" had disappeared with their seconds, their towels, their sponges and their water buckets. Scott and his party were emerging from Equality Hall and climbing into their motors. So there was nothing to be done.

Scott Was All Flustered

It was voted a great lark by all who saw it. But when the story appeared in a prominent position on the first page of one of the papers next day, Harry Scott became indignant. He thought it reprehensible that a newspaper should give such conspicuous attention to one of his private entertainments. The press had not been invited to attend and the press should have ignored the affair, he thought. This indicates, of course, that Harry Scott has not what is technically known as the "nose for news." He allowed himself to become quite indignant over the matter. He sought out the newspaperman who had written the story and there was a torrid scene. The newspaperman remained cool, not to say indifferent, while the temperature of Scott rose rapidly. Finally Scott made certain threats. But nothing happened.

All the Girls Wore False Hair

At a merry dinner at the Claremont Country Club Harold Havens of Oakland put five glittering twenty dollar gold pieces on the table with the announcement that they belonged to any lady present who could prove that she was not wearing false hair. Some of the girls took down their hair and were immediately laughed out of the contest, for everyone of them had some sort of a rat or puff in her coiffure. Others asseverated solemnly that they wore no false hair but refused to prove it by loosening their tresses. Nobody got the money.

There Was No Supper

Mrs. Phoebe Hearst sent out engraved cards last week inviting her friends to hear Sigmund Beel play at Century Hall. It was a very smart crowd that assembled on the appointed evening —and a hungry crowd. When the recital was over, everybody waited for the signal to adjourn to the supper room. Why? Well, because Mrs. Phoebe Hearst has earned a reputation for lavish entertainment and her guests took it for granted that she would provide them with supper. It was a perfectly gratuitous assumption, of course, but then our smart folk are peculiar. They take so many things for granted. Mrs. Hearst had provided no supper, in all likelihood believing that her guests would be delighted with the opportunity to hear Beel and would be prepared to seek their own suppers afterwards. When it became apparent that there was to be no free supper, a great many of the women were disgruntled. They murmured expressions of peevish disappointment. They went home in a very cross condition of mind. Next morning when they read in one of the papers that Mrs. Hearst had prepared a supper for her guests they were posi-

Mrs. Older to Publish

Mrs. Fremont Older's name is soon to appear on the title page of another novel. Her latest work has been accepted by the Scribner publishing house and will soon be seen in the bookshops. I understand that a religious theme dominates this latest literary effort and I am not surprised. When Hichens' "Garden of Allah" appeared Mrs. Older read it with great admiration and conceived the idea of a novel in which religion should play an important part. She devoted a great deal of time to the study of religious topics, even going so far as to take a special course of lectures at Berkeley. The fruit of this study is the book which is now in the hands of the publishers. I hear also that Mrs. Older has completed a second play. Her first dramatic work was done some time ago and was accepted by Miss Elsie Ferguson, the star of "Such a Little Queen" and other popular successes. The second play is in the hands of Mrs. De Mille, the New York dramatic agent, who has expressed the opinion that she will place it without difficulty.

There Was Too Much Puffing

Mrs. Morton Mitchell left Thursday for Paris. A charming woman she is and her friends will miss her. As Miss Lizzie Miller she was an early day belle of San Jose. She was the widow of George Ladd when she met and married Morton Mitchell. Now her home is in Paris and she visits us only at intervals. During her stay at the Fairmont she was extensively entertained. At one smart luncheon in her honor there was a contretemps worth telling. A girl who has several sisters, some matrons and some spinsters, produced her cigarette case at the beginning of the repast and without so much as "by your leave" proceeded to smoke. She smoked all through the luncheon. Mrs. Mitchell didn't like it and said so. "I am used to receiving 'puffs,' but I have never before been 'puffed" from soup to desert," she said. "I do not object to a smoke after the coffee has been served, but smoking throughout an entire meal is obnoxious in the extreme." But I doubt whether the girl minded the criticism, even if it did come from Mrs. Morton Mitchell of Paris and San Francisco.

A Not Uncommon Malady

The affliction from which Mrs. Gerrit Livingston Lansing seems to suffer is a very common one and it is unfortunate that she should be exposed to the humiliation attaching to the public discovery of her malady. Psychopathologists will tell you that kleptomania is as well defined a mental derangement as pyromania, the insane desire to set things on fire; but it is natural that popular prejudice should attach more obloquy to it on account of the universal detestation of a pilferer. The ignorant find it difficult to distinguish between one who pilfers through mental aberration and one who pilfers through cupidity; hence the peculiar misfortune of allowing the malady and its manifestations to become public. The fact that Mrs. Lansing's sister, Ethel Cohen Bent Owens, has suffered from the same disease should be conclusive of her innocence of crime. There is a good deal of kleptomania in our so-called smart society, but it is rarely made known outside the circle in which it occurs. Sometimes however there is a scandal and naturally the prominence of the parties accentuates the unpleasantness of the exposure. It will be remembered that the kleptomania of Mrs. Walter Castle was discovered in London and nearly led to her imprisonment. That was a case which was noticed by the newspapers all over the world.

Mrs. Lansing's Prominence

Mrs. Lansing's prominence has not been exaggerated by the newspapers. She comes of a well known family. Her mother, Mrs. Cohen, was Miss Gibbons, the sister of Dr. Henry Gibbons. Alfred Cohen married the daughter of the late Watson A. Bray of Alameda. Edgar Cohen and Mrs. Daggart who lives in the East are other members of the family. Ethel Cohen married Lieutenant Bent, but the marriage was not a happy one. After the divorce she became the wife of Lieutenant Owens. In the Greenway assembly set Mrs. Lansing has enjoyed a great deal of popularity and it is to be hoped that her friends will rally to her in the time of her trouble.

John Hays Hammond's Shirts

Great must be the satisfaction of John Hays Hammond. Good fortune which has always worn a golden smile for him, now casts his lines in pleasant, yearned-for, diplomatic places. He is to go to London as Envoy Extraordinary from these United States to the crowning of the new king. He is to abide next door to the Duke of Devonshire in the very house in Piccadilly where Baroness Burdett-Coutts used to live and entertain. And the rumor has gotten about that when the time comes to relieve Whitelaw Reid of his ambassadorship, John Hays Hammond will be accredited to the Court of St. James. It is a long cry from the Jamieson Raid to the coronation of George V, but John Hays Hammond's has been a life of glaring contrasts. Nobody realizes this better than Mrs. John Hays Hammond. She has confessed recently that once upon a time she washed her husband's shirts which, says an eastern paper of scoffing proclivities, may be true but is not as interesting to the public in general as Mrs. John Hays Hammond evidently believes. It is no great accomplishment, our irreverent contemporary points out, to be able to wash shirts. Any woman can master the art of shirt washing, so there is nothing extraordinary about the fact that an educated woman like Mrs. John Hays should become an adept laundress. Why in the name of suds is she bragging about it? Nor is it a matter for wonder that she should wash her husband's shirts. More than one neglected and long-suffering citizen has taken to wife-beating because his wife would not wash his shirts, but made him wash them himself or go unwashed. It does not make any difference why Mrs. Hammond washed the shirts, so long as they were washed. Why exploit the matter? Our great-grandmothers did up their own kerchiefs, their laces and the ruffled bosoms of our great-granddads yet they never went about boasting. That Mrs. John Hays has fallen into this habit must be for love of and belief in John. She wrote a book shortly after the Jamieson raid, giving an account of John and John's doings; what he ate, what he drank, what time he arose in the morning and what time he went to bed, what he wore and how he wore it; told such wearing details and told them in such a way that John Hays himself was bored and bought up every copy of the book which his devoted spouse had spent good money to have printed.

News from Del Monte

Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Skinner of St. Louis who arrived last week plan to remain for the rest of the season. The Keystone State was represented last week by Miss Anna and Miss Maude Richards of Easton who will be here for two or three weeks at least. T. B. Dougherty, one of the eminent attorneys of Los Angeles, was here on business for a few days recently. Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Marshall of New York have arrived for a long stay and expect to enjoy their visit very much, as they are both fond of outdoor life and automobiling. Mrs. William Jones, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Foster and Charles McKnight, good golfers all, had a very jolly foursome Saturday in spite of the fact that the course is a little heavy from the recent rains. Miss A. L. Lissberger of New York who is making a tour of the Pacific Coast studying color effects and making sketches, has returned after a stay in the south. She is charmed with the scenic beauty of the State and intensely interested in the splendid works of the California artists exhibited in the Del Monte Art Gallery.

From Pacific Grove Hotel

Mr. O. A. Wilson came down from the city Wednesday for a visit with some of his friends in the Grove. At the hotel last week Wednesday and Friday evenings were given up to a progressive bridge tournament which was delightful in many ways. There were four tables and Mrs. Lillian Duncan Baxter who, by the way, is a sister of Brigadier General Duncan in command of the Department of Texas, proved that she comes of good fighting stock by vanquishing all her opponents after a fiercely fought contest and carrying off the honors and the first prize. Friday evening Miss Nan Townley of Haywards, won first place, the second prize going to Miss H. A. Warner of New York who is well known in artistic and literary circles of the Empire State. Dr. C. A. Crockett who spent the week end visiting her friend Mrs. O. C. Coiner, also greatly enjoyed the tournament, for she is very expert at bridge and is so charming personally that she is always warmly welcomed by her many friends here. W. F. Thomas of Berkeley was here for a short stay last week. Miss Emma and Miss Frona Simon of Stockton arrived last week, and plan to remain for a long visit in sunny Pacific Grove. Mrs. R. D. Stevens and her beautiful daughter Estel, who have had as their guest Miss Eula Glide of Berkeley, left for their home in Stockton last week and will be greatly missed by their many friends at the hotel and in the Grove. They promised, however, to return soon, bringing some friends with them, for they had a jolly time here motoring and driving out for tea at the Lodge at Pebble Beach, and one evening went over with Mr. Foster and Dr. Graham for dinner at Del Monte, staying for the hop in the ballroom afterwards.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. Ralph W. Hoyt, Miss Katheryn Hoyt, Miss Louise Hoyt and Miss Louise Philpott are registered at the Hotel Victoria from Portland They will spend a short time in San Francisco before continuing their trip to Southern California. The Hoyts are prominent Portland people, Mr. Hoyt being the president of Portland's Rose Carnival.

A pencil sale for the benefit of the San Francisco Nursery for Homeless Children will be given on April 6, 7 and 8. The pencils will be sold for ten cents. Mrs. Jacob Bertz, Mrs. William Kauffman and Mrs. William L. Gerstle are arranging for this praiseworthy charity.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado included: Mrs. Charles Hartigan, Mrs. W. D. Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Edward F. Barron, Mrs. J. Downey Harney, James D. Phelan, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Altschuler and H. M. Hayward.

An elaborate dinner was tendered Mr. Edward Metzger Tuesday evening at the Granada Hotel by some of his friends in honor of the forty-first anniversary of his birthday. He was presented with a loving cup from his friends, Col. C. Mason Kinne making the speech. The party included Edward Metzger, M. Alexander, L. Alexander, G. Belden, F. A. Wilkins, L. C. Marshutz, E. F. Moran, E. Belasco, B. Levinger, S. Solomon, J. L. Graf, A. J. DeLamare, A. C. Bowles, John Pew, Matt Long, Dr. W. F. Blake, J. Brownstein, Eugene Davis, Frank Fox, J. M. Long and C. Mason Kinne.

Gossip of the Theatre

The Psychology of the Alcazar Audience

There was a time when I knew my Alcazar better than I know it now. That was in the old days before the fire when players who have since gone to Broadway or Heaven—the words are not synonymous—made the Moorish playhouse in O'Farrell street an institution of which every San Franciscan was exceedingly proud. The traditions of those days have never been overturned. The Alcazar of today is in every way the worthy successor of the Alcazar that has gone into history. But it seems to me that the character of the audience must have undergone a subtle change. Perhaps the law of evolution has applied to the Alcazar audience as it has applied to other institutions. Whether the change is for better or worse I shall not pretend to say. Suffice that it is very apparent. The transformation was brought home to me in a very marked fashion on Monday night in the course of Max Figman's presentation of "The Substitute." There is an incident in "The Substitute" which has to do with the principal character's divorce. It seems that he was charged with beating his wife. "Did you beat her?" asks somebody. "I didn't, answers Max Figman, and then after a significant pause, "but life is full of lost opportunities." It's a good line, a comic line, a line to laugh at. But is it a line to applaud? In the name of all that is holy in bachelor illusions, I say that it certainly is not! And yet the Alcazar audience applauded that line. Almost as one man—aye, and almost as one woman too, it smote its palms together in approbation. It was tickled with the line. There can be no doubt about that. But why was it tickled? Do the Alcazarans of today sympathize with the man who regards his failure to beat his wife as one of the lost opportunities of life? This seems improbable. The Alcazarans, when I knew them well, when I was one of them, had no sympathy for characters who mourned the lost opportunity of beating their wives. Marriage was a sacred institution in those good old days. The happy ending that warmed the hearts of the old Alcazarans was the matrimonial ending. When Ernest Hastings or Charles Waldron or White Whittlesey clasped the palpitating leading lady to his thumping heart and implanted a chaste kiss of true love on her trembling lips, the Alcazarans felt supremely satisfied. Wife-beating was a horror not to be mentioned without denunciation in those halcyon days. What has come over the spirit of the Alcazar dream? Have the romantic girl and the lovesick boy given place to the pessimistic married man and the embittered divorced person? Or am I mistaken altogether in probing the psychology of the new Alcazarans? Do they approve wife-beating in the Pickwickian sense of the term, the Reno method of wife-beating, so to speak? Perhaps Bernard Shaw will help to solve the difficulty. Let us turn to his "Getting Married." Divorced Rejjy knocked his wife down in the presence of the gardener. Listen to him: "What's the good of beating your wife unless there's a witness to prove it afterwards? You don't suppose a man beats his wife for the fun of it, do you? How could she have got her divorce if I hadn't beat her? I had to go out and dig that flower bed all over with my own hands to soften it. I had to pick all the stones out of it. And then she complained that I hadn't done it properly, because she got a worm down her neck." Is this the sort of lost opportunity that stuck in the minds of the Alcazarans when they applauded Max Figman? Are the Alcazarans more sophisticated than of yore? It may be so. Perhaps my misunderstanding is the just punishment of my non-attendance. If one would know the Alcazarans on both sides of the footlights, one must go there frequently. And they are worth knowing.

—Edward F. O'Day.

CHARLES MEAKINS and MABEL WILBER
In "The Merry Widow" at the Savoy Theater.

"The Merry Widow" Again

There is no term to the fun-making of Marsovia. The volatile spirits of that gladsome Nowhere are inexhaustible in their expedients of laughter. Their steps are dance steps and their movements are swayed by music. The commonplace is banned in their joyous lives and they have not so much as a passing nod for dull realities. They laugh, they sing, they flirt and kiss. Their peccadilloes are invariably discovered and just as invariably forgiven. They like a maid, love a matron, but adore a widow with money. And why not? The weeds of widowhood are unknown in Marsovia where good husbands never die. There is no mourning there. In fact there are no widows in Marsovia. They go to Paris to get them another husband and to be within dropping-in distance of Maxim's. They are the center of attraction at embassy balls and the hostesses of garden fetes. They are very susceptible and their wooing is irresistible. Even Marsovian princes of shocking bad habits cannot resist them, particularly when they have loved them of old. When they dance divinely to swooning violins or sing softly to sensuous flutes, all the world but Marsovia becomes a faraway dream and the soul floats drowsily on tinted clouds of romance. Who would not be a Marsovian prince and tease the merry widow into a declaration of love? Who would not be the pet of Lo-Lo and Do-Do, of Frou-Frou and Margot? And who would not give up these pretty lights-o'-love for the sake of country and twenty millions? Verily, Prince Danilo has many rivals. All the world loves his Merry Widow. All the world would dance with her. And it can; it does. In this part of the world we write her name Mabel Wilber. She is firmly lodged in our affections. She is good to look upon and good to hear, whether she sings her insinuating love ditties or whispers her fascinating coquetries. She is just as freshly enthusiastic now as when she first appeared before our delighted eyes; and we are more enthusiastic about her than ever. There may be better merry widows, but Mabel Wilber will do for us.

Dick Hotaling Redivivus

Dick Hotaling, millionaire among mummers and mummer among millionaires, is about to reinvade the "unfortified city of Oakland" whose unprotected condition elicited on a memorable occasion the warm pity of Henry Miller. It will be recalled that Dick who is as ready to play Sir Critic as to attempt to play Hamlet or Shylock, took exception to the production of "The Servant in the House" which Miller gave in this city, whereupon Miller voiced a general and particular exception to the existence, activities and opinions of our Dick. Miller in fact spilled a good deal of Attic salt, an unlucky thing for Hotaling who was apparently too flustered to throw a pinch of it over his left shoulder. But Dick avers that he can "come back" and will back his averment by a five weeks' engagement at Ye Liberty Playhouse, starting two days after April Fools'. Three modern plays will be in Dick's repertoire this time. They are "The House Next Door," "Mr. Hopkinson" and "The Melting Pot." The classic drama will be represented by "Hamlet" and "The Merchant of Venice." It is an attractive list. When Dick was seen last at Ye Liberty he packed the house and the man in the box office wore a golden smile that wouldn't come off. Henry Miller notwithstanding, Dick is an attraction of magnetic power and Bishop's enterprise in luring him back to Oakland must be commended.

Francis Wilson Next

"The Bachelor's Baby," Francis Wilson's latest comedy with the author in the principal role, will be seen at the Columbia on Monday night. It will run for two weeks. The story of the "Bachelor's Baby" is that of a confirmed bachelor who hates children. It is worked out with abundant regard for its opportunities of fun-making. Wilson will be supported by a clever company. Miss Edna Bruns will have the part of the bachelor's sweetheart. Matinees will be given on Saturdays only.

Kolb Comes to the Orpheum

C. William Kolb, recently one of the principals of the famous team of Kolb and Dill, will begin a two weeks' engagement at the Orpheum this Sunday matinee. Kolb has been meeting with great success as a star in the theaters of the Orpheum Circuit and his vehicle "The Delicatessen Shop" is said to afford him the funniest opportunity of his career. The Frey Twins will demonstrate their method of physical culture. Miss Hamid Alexander, a favorite in the English music halls, will sing to her own piano accompaniment. Stuart Barnes will amuse with a new stock of songs and stories. Next week closes the engagements of Lola Merrill and Frank Otto, The Six Flying Banvards, Jarrow the Lemon Trickster and "The Rolfonians."

Figman as "Mary Jane's Pa"

Max Figman will be well supported in "Mary Jane's Pa" at the Alcazar next week. Virginia Brissac, a fine leading woman, and Dorothy Mackay, the child who created the role of Mary Jane, have been specially engaged. Bessie Barriscale, Viola Leach, and Adele Belgarde will have important roles. There are three acts in the play, all of which will be presented with the usual Alcazar care.

Busoni, the Italian Pianist

Ferruccio Busoni, the marvelous pianist and eminent composer, will give his first concert at the new Scottish Rite Auditorium, Van Ness and Sutter, this Sunday afternoon, offering a great program of piano-forte music. Busoni's second and last concert will be given Tuesday night, March 21, with another fine program. In Oakland Busoni will play an entirely different program on Wednesday afternoon, March 22, at Ye Liberty Playhouse.

Marie Dressler Coming

The demand for seats for the second and last week of "The Merry Widow" at the Savoy is very large. The last performance will be given Sunday evening, March 26, and on the following Monday Marie Dressler will be seen in her great musical comedy success, "Tillie's Nightmare."

Mischa Elman Coming

Mischa Elman, the "master-singer of the violin," will be the next Greenbaum attraction. The sale of seats will open next Wednesday at Sherman Clay and Co's, where mail orders may now be addressed. The first Elman date is Sunday afternoon, March 26, at the new Scottish Rite Auditorium. The second and only evening concert is to be given Thursday. The farewell concert is scheduled for Sunday afternoon, April 2. Elman plays in Oakland at Ye Liberty on Friday afternoon, March 31. The St. Francis Musical Art Society will hear this artist on Tuesday night, March 28.

Belasco Comedy at Ye Liberty

Next week the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse will give Oakland playgoers their first opportunity of enjoying "Is Matrimony a Failure?" It is one of Leo Ditrichstein's adaptations from the German. Sydney Ayres closes his long engagement as leading man in the piece. Its run will be limited to one week, after which "The Lottery Man" will be given.

"The Old Curiosity Shop"

There is warrant for predicting that the Alcazar's production of "The Old Curiosity Shop," commencing March 27, will be the most pretentious ever offered by Belasco & Mayer. Max Figman who has made exhaustive study of the Dickens story and successfully appeared as Dick Swiveller in New York and Boston, will play that role here. His familiarity with the play will assure effective casting and staging. Dorothy Mackay, a clever child actress, has been brought from Chicago to play Little Nell. Mr. Figman believes that the Alcazar company will be adequate in the other parts. Elaborate and accurate staging is assured for Mr. Figman possesses copies of the original illustrations and is having the costumes and scenery made in strict accord with them. "The Old Curiosity Shop" has not been played in San Francisco since Lotta appeared as the Marchioness in the old California.

Miss Wilson's Concert

San Francisco music lovers are looking forward with keen interest to the Flora Wilson recital in the new Scottish Rite Auditorium on the evening of March 22. The Shadow Song from "Dinorah," exquisitely rendered at the first recital, has at the request of many who love the intricacies of a beautiful flexible coloratura voice, been added to the program of next week. It was Miss Wilson's singing of the Shadow Song that created such a sensation in Philadelphia last year.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The market was irregular during the past week with fitful bursts of activity. The undertone was strong and although business was still largely in the hands of the trading element there was a firm belief that after the decisions in the anti-trust cases were handed down a decided increase of public interest could be looked for unless the decisions were of an exceedingly drastic nature. Money continued very easy and the Bank of England reduced its discount rate to three per cent. Crop news has been of a favorable kind and this has been reflected in the granger roads. The United States Steel Corporation's statement, while showing an increase in tonnage over last month, was not as good as expected. The showing was an increase of 209-000 tons. Barring any unfavorable Supreme Court decisions it looks as if stocks could be bought around these levels.

Wheat — Favorable crop reports and fine weather have been too much for the wheat market the past week. These influences have been paramount and there has been much short selling, especially in the July option. The government figures showing a surplus on March 1 of nearly 180 million bushels was a little larger than the trade had looked for and in the absence of any bullish news in the way of a good cash demand or export sales, prices were on the down grade. Primary receipts are short of last year but are showing some increase over last week. Cash wheat demand is as disappointing as ever and the weakness of the new crop futures in the southwest shows the influence of the fine crop reports that have been coming in steadily. Experts sent out early in the week to examine wheat fields for Hessian fly reported only limited infection and this in early sown wheat only. Crop outlook is generally excellent. The foreign markets continue to drag and crop reports from the other sides are quite favorable. Under present conditions it looks as though it will be hard work maintaining wheat around these levels.

Corn—Very little is doing in corn although the market held remarkably well considering the weakness in wheat. Receipts have been moderate and stocks are showing a small increase each week at all terminals. The weather, while a little mild for shipment, has been favorable for pastures and it has cut down the consumption on the farm. The government figures indicate a reserve of 215 million bushels, larger than at the same time last year. There is nothing in the market at the moment except a scalp.

Cotton—The trade continues to take an unfavorable view of the political and business outlook in the United States and as a result the public has left the market to the professional trade which has resulted in a very narrow market. The statistical news in this country has all been in favor of the bulls. Export clearances have continued on a large scale and up to date we have exported nearly two million bales more than for the same period last year. Receipts of cotton at the principal ports show a falling off from the previous week and are now running even less than last year. Manchester mills decided at their last meeting to further curtail their output and report the trade outlook as very unsatisfactory. There was some little apprehension regarding the high temperatures in the south. As high as 98 was reported in Texas and it was thought that this was a forerunner of drouth. This fear was reflected in the new crop months by an advance of about 50 points. However conditions at the moment could hardly be better for preparing the soil and seeding a large acreage and it is a little premature to talk dry weather. Reports from the south state that there never was so much fertilizer used before and as the southern farmer received a good price for his cotton last year, he is in a position financially to put in a record-breaking crop. In the meantime the public are not in the market and the local trade does not seem strong enough to move the market either way very far.

compatible with his political prominence. But he has one of the biggest practices in the State. He is attorney for six banks and for the two-hundred million United Properties Company recently formed. His share in the winning of the Baldwin will case is fresh in the public memory.

He is a hard worker. Some people think he never plays. About once a year he strolls into the Pacific-Union club and usually leaves an epigram or two behind when he departs. About once in six months he goes to the theater. For physical exercise he walks—in the woods a good deal, for he loves nature and is an expert ornithologist. Sometimes he unbends his wit in postprandial oratory and those who have heard him rank him high in this accomplishment.

"Nature, human nature and books" is the way he sums up his favorite recreations. Undoubtedly books play a great part in his life. A larger part perhaps than politics, for he reads everything and is getting more and more aloof from active political endeavor. When will he retire?

"You never retire from politics," he says. "You may think you have retired, but let a friend ask for assistance and your coat comes off and you are back again in the thick of it."

"Do you believe in making a geneflection before you enter your pew?" asked Mrs. Oldcastle. "Mercy, no!" replied her hostess, as she flecked a bit of dust from the $2,000 grand piano, "if I have geneflections to make about people, I always do it outside of church."

And with a face cold as snow, with brows uplifted in astonishment, from under which could be seen the same enigmatic, impenetrable, dark pupils, she asked me: "But am I lying to you?"

She knew that I could not prove that she was lying and that with one single word she could demolish all the distressing creations of my tortured brain—with one more lying word. I expected it—and it glided from her lips, glittering on the surface with the colors of truth, but black at the bottom.

"I love you. Am I not wholly yours?"

The house in which we were was far from the city and the windows looked out upon the snow-field. Over it was obscurity and around it was obscurity—dense, motionless, mute. It shone with its own mysterious light, like the face of the dead in the darkness.

In the large-over-heated room only one candle burned, and through its reddish flame was seen the pale reflection of the dead field.

"No matter how bad the truth may be, I wish to know it. Perhaps I will die from it, but death is better than ignorance of the truth. I feel the lie when you hold me in your arms and are covering me with kisses. I see the lie in your eyes. Tell me the truth, and I will leave you forever," I said to her.

But she was silent and her glance, cold and inquisitive, penetrated deep into me, turned my soul inside out and surveyed it with a strange curiosity. And I shouted:

"Answer, or I will kill you!"

"Kill me!" she replied calmly. "Sometimes it is tedious to live. But do you think it possible to get at the truth by threats?"

And then I sank on my knees before her. Pressing her hands in mine and weeping, I pleaded with her for her pity—and for the truth.

"Poor boy!" she said, laying her hand on my hair. "Poor boy!"

"Take pity on me," I pleaded. "I so want to know the truth."

And I looked at her pure brow and thought that the truth was there, behind this thin bar, and a maddening longing seized me to tear away this bar so that I might be able to look at the truth. And under this white breast was beating a heart—I longed to claw the breast open and see, at least for once in my life, a human heart bared before me. The sharp flame of the dying candle looked motionless and yellow, and the darkened walls seemed to have retreated farther apart; and it was so sad, so lonesome, so painful.

"Poor boy!" she said. "Poor boy!"

The yellow flame flickered spasmodically and sank, turning blue, and then immediately went out. Darkness enveloped us. I did not see her face nor her eyes. She took my head in her two hands and I no longer felt the lie. Shutting my eyes, I did not think, did not live, I only absorbed into my being the perfume of her hands, and it seemed to me to be truthful. And her voice sounded in the darkness, timid and strange:

"Take me in your arms; I am afraid."

And again silence and again her frightened, low whisper:

"You demand the truth? But do I know it myself? And do I not myself wish to know it? Defend me! O, how terrible!"

I opened my eyes. The paling darkness of the room seemed flitting in fear from the tall windows and gathering in the corners—and something large, deadly white and mute looked into the windows. It seemed as if someone's hollow eyes were searching for us and enveloping us with his icy look. Shivering, we pressed close to each other and she whispered:

"Oh, how terrible!"

IV.

I killed her! I killed her; and when she lay lifeless and inanimate, by the window which looked out upon the white, dead field, I put my foot on her lifeless body and laughed. It was not the laugh of a madman. Oh, no! I laughed because my breath came evenly and easily, and I felt joyful, calm and empty—the worm which had been eating at my heart had dropped off. Bending over, I looked into her dead eyes, large and longing—they remained open and resembled the eyes of a wax doll—as round and dim as if they were covered by a film. I could touch them with my fingers, shut them and open them, and I felt no fear, because in the black, impenetrable pupil there no longer lived that demon of lies and doubts, who so long and so greedily had drunk my blood.

When I was seized, I laughed; and to the people who seized me the laugh seemed both terrible and wild. Some turned away from me with loathing and others went straight at me, stern and reproachful, as if bent on punishing me. But when their eyes met my bright, joyous glance, their faces instantly paled and their feet were riveted to the earth.

"A madman," they said, and this seemed to comfort them, because it helped them to explain the riddle: how one who loved could slay his beloved—and laugh.

Only one, a stout, ruddy-faced jolly man, said another word about me, and it hit me so hard that the blow almost felled me to the ground.

"Poor man!" he said with pity and without any anger—because he was so stout and so jolly. "Poor man!"

"Don't!" I shouted to him. "Don't dare to call me that!"

I do not know why I wanted to throw myself at him. Of course, I did not intend to kill him or hurt him in any way, but all these frightened people who saw a madman and a murderer in one were frightened still more, and shouted so that I once more broke into laughter.

When they led me from the room where her dead body lay I repeated loudly and insistently, looking at the jolly, stout fellow:

"I am happy! I am happy!" And it was the truth.

V.

Once in my childhood I saw a panther, and she took hold of my imagination and occupied my thoughts for a long time. She was not like any of the other animals that were stupidly dozing or looking viciously at the visitors. From corner to corner, in a straight line, she paced with mathematical precision, turning back always on the very same spot and every time touching with her gold-tinted side the same metallic rod of her cage. Her carnivorous, sharp head was lowered and her eyes looked before her without once turning aside. Before her cage crowds of people gathered daily; they spoke, laughed, and were noisy, but she never ceased walking and not once did she turn her eyes to the onlookers. Very few of those who were watching her had smiling faces; the majority gazed seriously and even gloomily at this living picture of painfully helpless concentration, and went away with a deep sigh. As they walked off they generally turned their heads back once more to throw her a long and questioning look, and sighed as if there were something in common in their fate—the fate of

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NIOT BE MADE.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Department No. 10, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of PHILIP BRADY, Deceased.

Richard J. Brady, the Administrator of the estate of Philip Brady, deceased, having filed his petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of the real estate of said decedent for the purposes therein set forth.

It is Therefore Ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the said Superior Court on Friday, the 21st day of April, 1911, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Courtroom of Department No. 10, Probate—of said Superior Court, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Richard J. Brady to sell the real estate of the said deceased.

And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four successive weeks in the "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in said City and County.

Dated, March 15th, A. D. 1911.

THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

Endorsed: Filed March 15, 1911. H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk. By E. B. Gilson, Deputy Clerk.

free people—with that of this unfortunate, caged beast. And later on, when I was already a grown man and people and books told me of eternity, I recollected the panther and it seemed to me that I already knew eternity and its pain.

Just such a panther did I become in my stone cell. I paced and thought. I walked in one straight, diagonal line, from corner to corner of my cell, and my thoughts also ran in one line—such heavy thoughts that it seemed to me that I was not carrying a head but a whole universe upon my shoulders. They consisted of only one word, but how enormous it was, how painful and sinister.

"Lie"—that is how this word was pronounced.

Again that word, hissing, crawled out of all the corners of my cell, and twisted round my soul; but it was no longer a small reptile—it now unfolded itself into a large, glittering, fierce snake. And it stung and suffocated me with its iron folds; and when I began to scream with pain, from my open mouth came out the same disgusting, hissing sound, as if my whole breast were swarming with reptiles.

"The lie!"

And I walked and thought, and before my eyes the gray asphalt of the floor turned into a grayish transparent abyss. My feet felt no longer as if they stepped upon a hard substance, and it seemed to me that I was soaring to an immeasurable height; I was soaring over the mist and clouds, and when a hissing groan escaped my breast, from underneath, from under the flimsy but impenetrable shroud, slowly came a terrible echo. So slowly and dully it came as if it had to pass through thousands of years, and every minute, in every particle of mist, it lost its power. I understood that there—underneath—it whistled like the wind that tears out mighty trees by the roots, but into my ear it entered, a sinister, short little whisper:

"The lie!"

This base whisper filled me with indignation.

I stamped my foot on the floor and shouted:

"There is no longer any lie! I have killed the lie."

And I purposely turned away, knowing beforehand what she would reply. And she slowly replied from the depth of the bottomless pit:

"It is a lie!"

The trouble with me was, as you may readily see, that I had made a dreadful mistake. The woman I had killed—but the lie I had made immortal. Do not kill a woman until by pleading, torture and fire you succeed in tearing from her soul the truth!

VI.

It is dark and terrible there where she has carried away with her the truth and the lie—and I shall go there. At the very throne of Satan I shall reach her and I shall fall upon my knees before her and plead with tears:

"Let me know the truth!"

But, great God! Is not this too a lie? There is the darkness and emptiness of eternity and she is not there, she is nowhere. But the lie remains. It is immortal. I feel it in every atom of the air, and when I breathe it enters my breast hissingly, and tears it, tears it!

Oh, what madness to be a man and to search for the truth! What pain!

"Save me! Save me!"

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 34,365.

HATTIE ELIZA POND, Plaintiff, vs. WILLIAM H. POND, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, Send Greeting to: William H. Pond, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful neglect of plaintiff, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion of plaintiff, and on the ground of defendant's habitual intemperance; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 24th day of February, A. D. 1911.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 30,014, Department No. 4.

SARA M. DALY, Plaintiff, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Hereinafter Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

Action in rem to establish and quiet Plaintiff's title to real property and to determine all adverse claims thereto.

The People of the State of California, to All Persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Sara M. Daly, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above-entitled Court, and City and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the north line of Randolph Street, distant twenty-five (25) feet easterly from the east line of Ramsell Street and running thence east twenty-five (25) feet; thence north one hundred (100) feet; thence west twenty-five (25) feet; thence south one hundred (100) feet to to the point of commencement; and being Lot 7 of Block 37 of the City Land Association as shown on a map of the same recorded on August 24, 1870, in the office of the Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, and being also the same premises heretofore conveyed to Annie A. Daly (widow) by Anne McCormac by deed recorded August 2, 1897, in Volume 1748 of Deeds, Old Series, Records of the City and County of San Francisco.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That this Court by its final judgment and decree, may ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, and may adjudge said plaintiff to be the owner in fee and in possession of said lands, and may establish and quiet its title thereto against all persons whomsoever claiming or to claim the same, and for such other relief in the premises as may be meet and equitable.

Witness my hand and seal of said Court this 31st day of December, A. D. 1910.

Greely and Virginia Cassidy Wilbur, plaintiffs, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County within three (3) months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows, to-wit:

1st. Commencing on the Northerly line of Pine Street at a point distant one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches Westerly from the Westerly line of Broderick Street; thence Westerly along the Northerly line of Pine Street twenty-seven (27) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles Easterly twenty-seven (27) feet and six inches; and thence at right angles Southerly and parallel with said line of Broderick Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement. Being a portion of Fifty (50) Vara Lot Number Two (2), in Block No. 540 as designated upon a certain map entitled "Hoadley's Extension of the Western Addition," which said map was recorded May 10, 1862, in the office of the Recorder of said City and County.

2nd. Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Southerly line of Geary Street (formerly Point Lobos Avenue) with the Easterly line of Second Avenue; thence Southerly along said line of Second Avenue one Hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles Easterly Thirty-two (32) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred (100) feet to the Southerly line of Geary Street; thence at right angles Westerly along said line of Geary Street thirty-two (32) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement; being part of Outside Lands Block No. 283.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer the plaintiffs will apply to the Courts for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: judgment of said Court which shall ascertain, determine and adjudge all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said real property and every part thereof, and which shall ascertain, determine and adjudge that plaintiffs are the owners in fee simple absolute and in the actual and peaceable possession of said real property and every part thereof, and that their title thereto is forever established and quieted.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 31st day of December, A. D. 1910.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By H. I. PORTER, Deputy Clerk

Memorandum—The first publication of this Summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 14th day of January, 1911.

Memorandum—The following persons are said to claim an interest in or lien upon said property adverse to plaintiff, Mary I. Greely:

Names	Addresses

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 33,681, Dept. No. 10.

PLINY E. RITNER, Plaintiff, vs. GRACE I. RITNER, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, Send Greeting to: Grace I. Ritner, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion of plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 18th day of January, A. D 1911.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

Auto Notes

Mr. George Fitz-Simons has been appointed sales manager of the E. R. Thomas Motor Car Company to succeed Mr. W. H. Van Deusen, resigned. Mr. Fitz-Simons is well known in the automobile industry, having been actively engaged in it for the last nine years. During the years of 1909 and 1910 he was sales manager of the Eastern Department of Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company with headquarters in New York City. For the past year Mr. Fitz-Simons has been the Packard dealer in Atlanta, Georgia, operating under the corporate name, Owners' Motor Company.

C. A. Emise, director of the Lozier racing interests, recently remarked upon the fact that the day of the foreign racing car is rapidly passing. "This is particularly true," said Emise, "in long road races where endurance is a quality of equal value with speed, and it is even more noticeably true where stock car requirements are enforced. A few of the specially built foreign racers still maintain a sort of supremacy in track racing and especially so in the shorter distances. This is because of their one burst of speed, unbacked however by that endurance quality necessary for the more strenuous road races. No foreign car racing either in this country or Europe approaches the Lozier's record for this season."

Over thirty thousand miles of service is the record recently established by a Diamond tire that equipped a Locomobile owned by Mrs. Wm. Winters of Spokane. Writing to the local branch of the Diamond Rubber Co., John Raymond of Palo Alto who removed this tire from the car said, "This Diamond tire had been on Mrs. Winters' car since 1908. I know that it has run 30,000 miles and would be willing to testify to that fact before a notary public. The tire was removed eventually, not because it had seen its entire service, but because of its ragged appearance."

On March 1 Mr. O. B. Leonhart was appointed manager of the Oakland branch of the Pioneer Automobile Company. Mr. Leonhart is well known to the automobile trade and to the general commercial interests of the Pacific Coast, having been connected in the past with several large mercantile concerns. Mr. Leonhart's friends predict a bright future for him in the automobile business.

"Wherever you find a farm owner who owns a motor car of quality you will find a man whose social life has been revolutionized," says Charles T. Jeffery, president of the Thomas B. Jeffery Company. "He has combined the advantages of the town with the pleasures of living in the country and adopted a method of saving time, meanwhile adding to his comfort and saving his horses for their more important work on the farm."

Trailers for carrying freight over city and country roads will be made hitched onto automobiles if the Hudson Motor Car Company decides to take advantage of an offer made to them, says E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Co. The offer was made to the Hudson people by a western concern, the manager of which stated that it was too dangerous trying to make time on the roads with a high wheeled spring wagon and what they want is a low automobile trailer.

T. F. Kilmartin, associated for the past few months with the local branch of the Haynes Auto Sales Company, has just gone to Los Angeles to take charge of the mechanical department of the Haynes branch in that city. Kilmartin was connected with the Haynes factory in Kokomo, Indiana, for some time and is thoroughly acquainted with the mechanical end of the business.

MOTOR MAXIMS

Still motors run cheap.

It's a wise chauffeur that knows his own speed.

A garage is known by the cars it keeps for hire.

A motor in hand is worth two in the ditch.

A spark-plug that can spark and won't spark ought to be plugged.

He who speeds and runs away may live to be nabbed some other day.

A rut in the road may prove the power behind the thrown.

Little motors have big gears.

A scorched chauffeur dreads the tire.

A good car needs no push.

It's a poor clutch that won't work in a tight squeeze.

Too many tinkers spoil the car.

Never judge a motor by the mortgage on the roof.

A green chauffeur maketh a fat undertaker.

A car in time saves sole leather.

All cars are gray in the dark.

Of two constables, choose the smallest.

Collisions never come singly.

Sweet Charity

"We was standin' in Princes street, Dunedin, one Sat'dy night," writes Oscar G., in the "London Bulletin," "when up comes a Salvation lassie—nice lookin' she was—and she 'olds out the tambourine to me and smiled. I smiled back, and dropped in a tanner, and big Scotty followed me good example and ante-d up a bob, asking for saxpence change. The Salvy girl put the bob in the plate and give 'im a sprat back.

"Just then I remembered I 'ad 'arf-a-quid in me pocket, an' I looks to see if I 'adn't giv it to the girl. Too true, I 'ad. So I told the lassie, and she looked through the tambourine an' couldn't find it. She said, 'It would be here, if you really gave it to me.' Then it hit me hard that Scotty had got my harf-quid as change for 'is bob. I got to that Scotchman lively. He said he'd got no money of mine, and he showed me 'is purse—a shillin', a tray bit, an' harf a quid.

"Course, I knew the harf-quid was mine, but 'e swore 'e brought it out wiv im, an' it wasn't mine; and we argued the point, an' I 'it 'im, an' he 'it me, an' we gripped an' fell, and we mopped up the gutter with our clothes. Tork about a go; it took the whole army to separate us. I done in a new suit, an' got a black eye, to say nothin' of nearly losin' me job.

"But I got me harf-quid. I'd left it at 'ome."

Young Man—I suppose your sister will make her appearance soon.

Small Brother—I guess she's making her appearance now. That's what's keeping her.

From the City

"I suppose there are some queer characters around an old town like this."

"There are," responded the ancient fisherman, 'when the hotels fill up."

ILLUSTRATED LIST COUNTRY AND TOWN ESTATES AND RESIDENCES FOR SALE AND TO LET

Published under four classifications, viz:

1. Landed estates for sale and to let.
2. Unfurnished houses and resorts for sale and to let.
3. Furnished houses and resorts for sale and to let.
4. Furnished and unfurnished apartments to let.

TO SETTLE AND SEGREGATE AN ESTATE

To Be Sold—Thirty-five minutes to San Francisco, this substantial mansion occupying a situation of exceptional beauty. The estate consists of the home, outbuildings, large stable and 47,000 square feet of land, in its entirety costing over $55,000. The land is surrounded by a marble bulkhead, being a corner 200x225 feet. The house is 3 stories, contains 16 rooms and 2 baths, billiard room, conservatory, and is heated by a furnace. In construction the old colonial disregard for extravagance in choice of woods is shown—the stairway is solid black walnut, while the woodwork of the chambers is in birdseye maple. The property is located in the center of the population of East Oakland, in the Thermal Warm Belt, and is an ideal family home or a remarkable opportunity for a high class and exclusive sanitarium. Can be bought for less than one-fourth its cost. Convenient payments can be arranged. Laymance Real Estate Co., Sale Agents, 1214 and 1216 Broadway, Oakland, Cal. Phone Oakland 328.

IN A FAVORITE PART OF BERKELEY

$7,000 Extremely choice, modern 10-room residence on boulevarded street in Claremont Park, near north gate, close to two Key Route stations and electric transportation; construction, conveniences and the artistic features were all given the most careful attention by owner and builder; the living-room (16x20) has high paneling in natural redwood, built-in window seats, and with beautiful art electroliers; library (12x14) is finished to correspond and has bookcases, etc.; the dining-room (15x20), which is unusually attractive, has both the walls and ceiling massively paneled, the latter in addition to heavy cross-beaming; floors of these rooms are double and finished in polished parquetted oak; the kitchen is large and well arranged, has fine pantry, also pass pantry to dining-room; the bedroom on this floor, intended for a servant's room, has commodious closet, also running hot and cold water; the five bedrooms are unusually large, the two in front of the house being respectively 13x17 and 13x14; the woodwork on this floor is in a finish of white enamel throughout and the walls are newly tinted in most attractive shades; a sleeping deck 10x32, linen closets and a bathroom 9x12 complete the appointments of this floor, which can be completely severed from downstairs by the closing of a large door; there is a cemented basement containing laundry, furnace-room equipped with a splendid furnace leading through registers to every room of the house, and ample space for storage and also the addition of servants' quarters. The lot, 50x132, faces south and is absolutely free to the sun on all sides. House is in perfect condition and has recently been under lease at $75 per month; terms of $1000 cash and monthly payments of about $75 can be arranged. DODGE VER MEHR CO., 2015 Shattuck Ave., "At Key Route Terminal," Berkeley, Cal.

FIFTY TO SIXTY DOLLARS

These admirably located apartments, constructed with great care for the comfort and convenience of the occupants, are perhaps the most desirable renting accommodation on the east side of the bay. They consist of 5 rooms each and bath, the conventional arrangement is relieved by one of the sleeping rooms being built on outside porch. It is shown in the right of the picture with the canvas drawn. Modern in every particular; grand views, lots of sunshine, large living room—fireplace. The general arrangements of these apartments with their dainty buffet, kitchen and conveniences have quite captivated those who have seen them. Corner of Telegraph avenue and Woolsey street, a block from the new S. P. electric station and 5 minutes to Key Route. Apply to owner, 3100 Telegraph avenue, Berkeley, Cal.

TEN MINUTES FROM THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA—THOUSAND OAKS

This grand and beautifully wooded acreage, for years the playground of nature lovers and Mecca of picnic parties, is being subdivided for home sites. The landscape engineer has supplemented nature's profusion in this wonderful place so that the general contour of the country may not be disturbed. Situated on the western slope of the Berkeley hills overlooking the bay of San Francisco it occupies an ideal position for a home. These properties can be bought for from $25 to $35 per foot, all street work done. Directly accessible by the Key Route or Southern Pacific electric when finished. Apply to Newell-Hendricks, Inc., 2037 Shattuck Ave., Berkeley, Cal. Phone Berkeley 398. San Francisco office, Westband Bldg., 830 Market St.

A BEAUTIFUL ELIZABETHAN HOME

$30,000—Situated on a 6-mile avenue. This complete residence cost the owner $50,000. Located midway between Oakland and Berkeley it has the educational advantages found in a college town while the city is but a short car ride away. From the rear of this home an unrivaled view of San Francisco Bay can be had while from the front of the house the Berkeley hills mark the sky line. The interior finish is mahogany, while every modern convenience is installed. A rare offering presenting a combination of delightful residential and speculative features. The draperies and hangings go with the place. Thirty-five minutes from San Francisco. Laymance Real Estate Co., 1214 and 1216 Broadway, Oakland, Cal. Phone Oakland 328.

Thirty-Five Minutes from Town

$7,000—This substantial 8-room house—built by the owner as a home—is offered for sale. The lower floor consists of 5 rooms, the living and dining room being paneled and finished in subdued tones of brown. The breakfast room, kitchen, servant's room and a large back porch that can be used as a conservatory complete this floor. The second floor has three large bed rooms, the two rear rooms opening to a large covered sun deck or sleeping porch 27x14. The never tiresome Berkeley hills are the view from this porch while a splendid view of San Francisco Bay by day or the city sparkling in the night can be had from the front of the house. Heated by 2 fire places and furnace, lawn back and front of house, berry arbor and stable with concrete floor. A splendid opportunity—very desirable terms. Owner, 6652 Dana street, Oakland, Cal.

Breakfast Room

$5,500—This new modern house carries the old story "too large for the owner." It is built on a delightful corner, East of Telegraph avenue but in Berkeley, and is modern in every particular, consisting of 6 rooms with 3 bed rooms on the second floor, living room, dining room and kitchen on lower floor. The house faces west and great care was taken in its construction, the rooms being large and light. It is particularly accessible, being but 2 blocks from the new S. P. electric station, 1 block east of Telegraph avenue, 2 blocks north of Alcatraz avenue. Terms can be arranged. Owner, 2400 Woolsey street, Berkeley. Phone Berkeley 4641. Thirty-five minutes from town. (Inspected and recommended.)

One thousand dollars less than any similar house in Oakland; the greatest bargain on the market; get busy, save commission, buy from owner and builder. For sale, grand 7-room stucco house, matchless in color and appointments; large sleeping balcony; 2 fireplaces; handsome built-in sideboard and bookcases; beamed ceilings, paneled walls, hardwood floors, elegant staircase; buffet kitchen; sun in every room; sleeping apartments upstairs; marine and hill view; large lot, 50x130; driveway. If you want a fine home, see this; choice residence section; convenient to local lines and Key Route; terms if desired. W. A. Sleep & Bros., 6453 Duncan street, near Woolsey. Phones, Piedmont 2422; H 6440.

Five hundred dollars under anything in Claremont Court. Nothing there to compare with it. Claremont Key Route takes you to the entrance to Claremont Court, where we have for sale fine 7-room stucco house with large sunny covered sleeping porch; two mantels, piped for furnace; cement basement; hardwood floors; beamed ceilings; mirror door; all rooms sunny and large; large bedrooms upstairs; marine and hill view; large lot. This is the greatest bargain ever offered on Forest avenue, in Claremont Court, Berkeley's choicest residence section. If you want one of the finest homes on the market, see us at once. We will be at the house every day. W. A. Sleep & Bros., owners and builders.

The Short Ballot

It will not matter much in the long run whether we have a long ballot or a short ballot. Of much greater importance is the question of the interval between elections. The multiplication of political issues, the "incessant human wriggle and struggle for office," the bigotry engendered by the constant play of political passions—these are the things that affect the moral life of a community, that paralyze sentiment and increase the defects of government. A mercantile deputation from Bordeaux being asked by Louis XIV what should be done to advance their interests, replied, "Sire, let us alone." That is what the people should say to their politicians who are harassing them with constitutional amendments designed to intensify political strife and to keep the political pot eternally boiling. "Man," says the poet, "never is but always to be blest," and this is especially true in respect of government in these piping times of innovation and experiment. For the present we are being regaled with sophomoric and academic discussion of the proposal to centralize power in the hands of the Governor. We are told that as at present there are too many elective officers the voters get both confused and careless, and that the tax on their capacity for discrimination should be reduced. This singularly enough is the argument of men who advocate the giving of more power to the people and more opportunities of exercising it. And as usual they are very dogmatic and very impatient of opposition. As usual they assume that everybody who dissents from their views is a crook. The Examiner, somewhat more restrained than usual, is content with the paradox that everybody who doesn't wish to diminish the power of the people is an enemy of popular government. The Examiner, it may be remembered, conducted the fight for the Charter in much the same strain. And the Charter, by the way, embodied the very same principle that is now being so furiously advocated. The Charter centralizes power in the hands of the Mayor. It was by the Charter that the Mayor was given control of the police, fire, election and school departments, and those departments have been at the mercy of a political machine ever since. Expressed in a few words the theory on which the short ballot is advocated is this: As a result of the elimination of minor officials from the ballot the people will always elect a Governor who will always appoint the most competent and most honest subordinates. But the probability is that as a result of increasing the patronage of the Executive it will become much more difficult for the people to prevent the election of undesirable men to the gubernatorial office.

Wheeler's Views on Marriage

It might be an interesting question for a debating society whether, as the Rev. Benjamin Ide Wheeler of the State University says, coeducation in American universities is conducive to the highest and most ideal kind of marriage. Either opinion might be urged with much philosophy and many illustrations. Dr. Wheeler with characteristic pedagogic faith in statistics supports his opinion with data gathered through the years. He has seen some happy marriages result from the mating of university graduates. But Dr. Wheeler's argument may be refuted by the very same means which he employs to clinch it. You can prove anything with statistics. And one of the easiest things to prove is that many educated persons have been unhappily mated. Education does one of two things: it either kills or stimulates imagination. Now a lively imagination is not conducive to contentment in the married state. A lively imagination was chiefly what the matter was with Shelley. Sometimes education does to a woman what it did to Anna Strunsky, a product of Stanford, who doesn't believe in marriage at all, and whose views of marriage are very much the same as those of George Bernard Shaw, himself a cultivated scholar. Persons who do not agree with Dr. Wheeler might find much to support their views in Balzac, who was perhaps as keen an observer as the President of the State University, and who is believed by students to have known more about human nature than even Shakespeare. Balzac studied the affinity question, and it was his opinion that there would be fewer unhappy marriages in the world if the government would create a school for virtuous wives with a view to teaching each wife how to be "all women in one." That was what the author of the human comedy believed to be the secret of happiness in marriage—the principle of feminine universality. The mental cultivation of an educated man's wife, in Balzac's opinion, is insufficient if she lacks a certain other kind of cultivation which governments will not teach because, as he says, "they are so strait-laced." Of course Balzac does not assume that in the case of every educated man it is essential to happiness in the married state that he should have a wife who is "all women in one." He alludes to the average man. Perhaps it will be said by those who disagree with him that he alludes to the average Frenchman. By way of answer to this suggestion Dean Swift may be quoted; for certainly he was not thinking of the average Frenchman when he observed that "few marriages are happy because young ladies spend their time in making nets, not in making cages." Young ladies no longer spend their time in making nets, but Dr. Wheeler would have them spend their time making themselves familiar with Euclid. If we may be pardoned the intrusion of our own opinion we should suggest that successful marriage is the preservation of illusions which is not to be accomplished by education. And hence we believe with Shakespeare that "hanging and wiving go by destiny."

Our Darling Islands

What Count Ernest Von Reventhlow, the most noted of German military authorities, has said about the importance to Japan of precipitating war with this country before the completion of the Panama Canal is precisely what the army and navy officers of this country have been saying for at least two years. Count Von Reventhlow says that our naval base in the Philippines is an intolerable menace to Japan. This is true, but it is not the only reason why Japan is eager to disposses us of the Philippines. Japan needs the Philippines for her own protection not only from this country but from all other countries. With the Philippines in her possession it would be most unlikely that any European nation without the co-operation of China would ever challenge her ascendancy in the Far East. So, as Count Von Reventhlow says, "it is a life question with Japan," and as he also says, "there is no doubt that her rulers are fully aware of this truth." It is also a live question as our army officers in the Philippines are aware. But how is Japan to find a casus belli? The answer is, By her colonization schemes in Mexico or in South America. Let the occasion arise for our assertion of the Monroe Doctrine in a controversy with Japan and Japan will apply the principle to that part of the Orient where for the present her sway is all but supreme. Our military authorities are convinced that we shall find it utterly impossible to evade war with Japan. They say that portents of the coming conflict are in the very atmosphere of the Orient; that nobody can spend any time there mingling with the men of all nations in the military and diplomatic service without feeling instinctively that we must soon be drawn into that maddest of all the mad games the world so loves to play. Furthermore it is their opinion that unless we speedily prepare for war by greatly enlarging our army we shall not be able to hold possession of the Philippines. They are very pessimistic about the prospects. The more that wise men ponder the situation the more they lament the folly that induced the acquisition of the Philippines. Those islands have been the source of great expense and great worry, and nobody knows how they are ever to be of any benefit to us. Of course the most sensible thing to do is to sell them, but what an awful uproar the jingoes would make if the proposal were to be seriously considered!

The Federal Corporation Tax

Speaking of the Federal corporation tax decision the Chronicle says, "Many of the fathers of the Republic expressed grave doubts of the propriety of making a Federal court the final interpreter of Federal powers 'because they were apprehensive of the tendency of all governments or subdivisions of governments to extend their powers to their utmost limit.'" The truth is the Founders created the Federal court for no other purpose than to prevent the subdivisions of the government from usurping powers which were not delegated to them by the people. Its principle and largest function was designed to be as it has been the defence and preservation of the embodiment of the sovereignty of the people, which is the Constitution, the permanent fundamental law on which our system of government depends. The Chronicle seems to be laboring under the delusion that the Supreme Court is to blame for the corporation tax. That tax was imposed by the representatives of the people, by the Congress of the United States, that august body of gentlemen from which has been flowing of late a stream of criticism on the Constitution. Why blame the Supreme Court for the corporation tax? Unquestionably the tax is morally unjust, but the Supreme Court has nothing to do with moral justice. The Supreme Court was called upon merely to ascertain whether the Congress exceeded the powers bestowed on it by the people through the medium of the Constitution. The Chronicle says the Supreme Court upheld the tax act because in the minds of the Justices the authority of the Federal Government is paramount to the States in all matters as to which it desires paramount jurisdiction. This is bald misrepresentation. The Chronicle knows that the Supreme Court does not lose sight of the declaration of the Constitution that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The tax act was upheld because it violates no provision of the Constitution—because in other words if not moral, it is at least legal.

The Licentiousness of Government

According to the Chronicle the chief objection to the Federal corporation tax is that it indicates the growing determination of the National Government to put itself in the position of the American people and to usurp powers which the people never conferred upon it. The same objection may be justly urged against most of the laws that are passed not only by the Congress but by the Legislatures of the several States. From time immemorial it has been the habit of all governments gradually to absorb the natural rights of the people. And we are now seeing that even under a so-called free government a people may be governed too much. The Founders of our government tried very hard to prevent such a disaster as seems to be overtaking us. They announced that man had certain natural rights, usually described as life, liberty and property, which are indispensable to human freedom and happiness, and they declared that these rights were not derived from, but were antecedent to, government. And they proceeded to form a government for no other purpose than to preserve those natural rights of man. It was their design to make it impossible for the government ever to infringe or disregard those rights or to fail to redress their invasion. The problem they had to solve was a hard one: they had to give the people sovereign power and at the same time prevent the people for their own good from abusing that power. And they approximated a solution; nothing more. The people are today invading every one of the natural rights of man. They are doing so through their representatives in legislative bodies, and the courts are powerless to prevent them. For the efficacy of the law is not inexhaustible. A large field of human conduct is subject only to policy and morality. It has become the policy of the people to regard the entity which is known as a corporation as something over which the government ought to exercise a sort of police power. Hence the various schemes of regulation and taxation, the injustice of which like the injustice of everything else in this world is having its ill effects. The bulk of the business of this country is done by corporations, and naturally the harassing of them is injurious to business generally. The people suffering as they are from business depression are paying the penalty of their own immorality, and they will continue to suffer despite bountiful crops, despite the expansion of foreign trade, till they call a halt on the pernicious activities of their mischievous politicians and demand that they let business alone. The corporation tax against which the Chronicle declaims is one of the least of our evils. We can stand the tax but what we cannot stand is the Roosevelt brand of crazy extravagance that made it necessary. There may come a crisis when it will be imperative to raise a very large sum of money, and it is very important that meantime we should not tap those sources of revenue which ought to be husbanded for none but extraordinary emergencies.

Speaking of the short ballot the Examiner says that our Governor "can nullify a law by his veto." Then our Governor is as powerful as an unconstitutional monarch. In other States it is the prerogative of the Governor to veto acts of the Legislature, but the laws are beyond the reach of the Executive.

T. R. doesn't approve the application of the recall to the judiciary—but there are times when the end may justify the means. A typical Roosevelt straddle! The times are: first, when Teddy doesn't like the judges; secondly, when Teddy feels that the greater good must be advanced.

"I will demonstrate on the evidence of thinkers and historians that, with the exception of wars of independence, the majority of those waged have been useless and as sad for the conquerors as for the conquered," says Paul d'Estournelles de Constant, peace propagandist. Why take the trouble? We all know that life was, is and always will be full of sad, useless but inevitable things.

Correspondence

Pearls of Wisdom from Yreka

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Permit me to express appreciation of editorial space accorded in your issue of the 4th inst., and also to thank you for the rifts of light you were kind enough to attempt to flash through that "Cimmerian darkness." One good turn deserves another, however, and Yreka begs to supplement a former charity to San Francisco by a present courtesy—of correction. In your editorial you speak of "Judge Works, who favors the recall" (of the judiciary). Your "experiment" on facts on that proposition was a failure. Try again. You also state that "our Federal Government . . . appoints judges to the bench for life." This statement is more of an elimination than it is a quotation. The Federal Constitution not only declares the principle of the recall as to its judges, but expressly provides the machinery through which such recall may be accomplished. That machinery, however, is about to be brought a step closer to the people through the election of United States Senators by direct vote. In applying the recall to state judges the people are adhering to the principle declared for by Adams and Jefferson and even Hamilton, and are simply changing the machinery through which it is to operate—substituting, if you please, the automobile for the "one horse shay," the automatic for the muzzle loader.

A great part of your editorial is devoted to a criticism of my use of the term "untried experiment" as designative of our democracy in its initial stage, and you graciously refer to "The History of Republics," by John Adams, as a work that Yreka attorneys should consult before daring to cross swords with the "moulders of public opinion" in San Francisco. I realize fully how badly handicapped are the "moulders of public opinion" in the great city of San Francisco since "the great fire," which, as at Alexandria in an earlier century, destroyed splendid libraries, and I beg to extend the invitation to you and to those of your school who would wish to delve deeply into the question at issue to come to Yreka, where you will find private libraries, where in leather chairs you may commune with the nation builders through well booked volumes whose pages are all cut, and where a most gracious welcome awaits you. You will then learn that John Adams, in speaking of the Constitution and the initiation of our democracy, in his splendid work entitled "Defense of the American Constitutions," said to its detractors, "A political experiment cannot be made in the laboratory nor determined in a few years." You will also have called to your attention the words of Franklin at the closing hour of the Constitutional Convention, when our Ship of State was first launched on an experimental sea. Gazing on the sun painted on the back of the chair in which Washington sat, Franklin declared that to him that sun at last "appeared as the rising sun"—a harbinger of hope for the successful voyaging of the national craft. You might also be able to say with Franklin, "Ca ira! ca ira! it will all come out right in the end."

You will also find that Lincoln looked upon our government as an experiment, when he spoke of the "new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created free and equal" and voiced the suppliant hope "that government of the people, by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth." To the early formula of our democracy, then still in the alembic of nationhood, Lincoln and the men of his day added a new potion that hastened, if it did not bring the demonstration. I also find justification for the use of the term "experiment" in definition. Webster says "experiment" is "to test by trial." The Standard Dictionary defines it as "something undergoing the test of actual experience." In such goodly company citizens of Yreka are quite willing to grope in what appears to the "moulders of thought" in San Francisco as "Cimmerian darkness," and we beg to suggest that perhaps that "Cimmerian darkness" will disappear if you but open your eyes.

I appreciate that your allusions to the "classics" give erudite pose to your presentation, but I beg to suggest that we sometimes observe that even editors of city weeklies who are permitted to sit at the Statesmen Table, while assuming the wisdom of Solomon, repeat the mistakes of Moses.

With a short quotation from John Adams, whom you cite, I will most respectfully conclude.

"Rulers are no more than attorneys, agents and trustees for the people, and if the case, the interest and trust is insidiously betrayed or wantonly trifled away, the people have the right to revoke the authority that they themselves have deputed and to constitute abler and better agents, attorneys and trustees."

Yours truly,

—James F. Farraher.

(So shrewd a man as Mr. Farraher ought to have perceived from the text that the statement that Judge Works was in favor of the recall was either a slip of the pen or a typographical error. As to John Adams' assertion that "A political experiment cannot be made in the laboratory, etc.," he was not speaking of democracy in the abstract as was Mr. Farraher. Mr. Farraher's words which were commented on in these columns were: "A fact overlooked in some of the arguments offered is that in the day of Marshall and Jefferson, democracy was an untried experiment." He did not utter these words extemporaneously. He put them in a letter written for publication. Now John Adams was speaking of the American constitutions and of the forms of government in our States. Our Republican form of government which Lincoln said was conceived in liberty, was, it is true, an untried experiment. There is no doubt about this, nor is there any quarrel with Mr. Farraher on the question of definition. Finally as to what John Adams said about rulers and the right of the people to revoke their authority, from that sentiment no intelligent man will dissent. But Mr. Farraher must know that in the common acceptation of the meaning of the world a ruler is something quite different from a judge. A ruler governs, but a judge is one who interprets the law; the ruler holds the rod of authority, the judge holds the scales of justice. Mr. Farraher will have some difficulty in finding anything in the writings of John Adams suggesting the possibility of his ever having thought of having judges subject to a popular recall. By John Adams, nor by any other great statesman in all the world's history was ever such a proposition discussed, because until the day and generation of Mr. Farraher it was never conceived. Most intelligent men understand that the citizen is not free where anything that belongs to the administration of justice is decided by any one but the courts, where interpretation or application of the law belongs to any one else than to the judiciary. And hence, as Francis Lieber once said, "There ought never to be pressure from without, either by a Stuart sending for the judges to tamper with them, or to ask them how they would decide a certain case if brought before them, or by a multitude assuming the name of the people." As, according to Mr. Farraher, Yreka has a fine library it may be well to commend to him the chapter on the Judicial Department in Justice Story's work on the Constitution. Justice Story is perhaps a better authority than John Adams. Justice Story, writing on the importance of the independence of the judiciary, says that when judges are not independent they will "be apt to decree what best suits the opinions of the day, and to forget that the precepts of the law rest on eternal foundations." And he adds: "And thus the fundamental maxim of a republic that it ought to be a government of laws and not of men will be silently disproved or openly abandoned." Mr. Farraher understands perhaps that under our form of government the people stand in the same relation to the courts as does the king in a monarchy and that the Founders appreciated the fact that a despotism of the people was as much to be guarded against as a despotism of the crown.—Editor Town Talk.)

Employers' Liability and Pauperism

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Our employers' liability law which is being so highly extolled in some quarters will be found to be productive of misery as well as of blessings. Such has been the experience of England which has been rapidly drifting into Socialism of late. As a result of the employers' liability law in England the number of paupers has been greatly increased, for employers are taking no chances with men who have any physical defects by which they may be more or less exposed to injury. Men are no longer permitted to grow old in English factories. Men are not kept on the pay-roll for sentimental reasons. In many lines of industry none but the physically sound, none but perfect specimens of manhood find employment. Consequently many families have suffered from the reduction of the number of their bread-winners, and many men have become paupers who otherwise would have been able to earn a living. Now anything that is conducive to pauperism is a bad thing. It's as bad for the poor as it is for the rich. The country in which pauperism is spreading is in a bad way, and it has been spreading in this country rapidly enough without any employers' liability law. This country is suffering from the pension habit, and the pension habit is a species of pauperism. It encourages thriftlessness and idleness. Firemen, policemen, school teachers—all want to be pensioned, and when government ownership gets a firm hold on us as it surely will all public servants will have pensions provided for them; for government ownership means a vast army of servants, so vast as to be able to dictate to its masters. By the way, Mexico affords a fine study of the effects of government ownership. It is by government ownership that Diaz has perpetuated himself in office and enslaved the common people.

Respectfully,

—Charles Appleton.

XIV—FRANCIS WILSON

By Edward F. O'Day

There is a golden look about Francis Wilson. Glints of gold are in his thinning hair and his soft smiling eyes; and in the sensitive lines of his finely molded face, especially in the vertical clefts on either side of his tender mouth, there is a rich but mellow suggestion of the precious metal. It seemed to me too that there was no dearth of gold in Francis Wilson's character. Knowing him through the vicarious intimacy of an enthusiastic mutual friend, it would not have been surprising if disappointment had jarred the first tentative contact, but nothing of the sort occurred. I found him as I had been asked to expect to find him, a gentleman of modesty, simplicity and courtesy, a talker with meat on his phrases, a player with a big warm heart, a play writer with eager ambition and serious purpose. I found him a man of the world unhurt by its barbs of cynicism, untroubled by its misunderstandings, a man who can smile and smile that golden smile of his and remain tenacious of his opinions, his purposes and his settled habits of a well-ordered life.

It is not difficult, after meeting Francis Wilson, to understand why Eugene Field loved him, wrote for him, showered him with mementoes. It is not hard to explain why he should so have won upon the affections of Joseph Jefferson that when that great player died he was able to write with penetrating sympathy of his life and work. It is easy to realize why bibliophiles call him brother and why writers dedicate their books to him. Fine actors are unusual men and Francis Wilson is not only a fine actor but also an unusual one.

His natural buoyancy was somewhat weighted by what he considered the coldness of the first night audience at the Columbia. It was a colder first night than he has been used to since presenting "The Bachelor's Baby." Of course he is sensitive.

"The actor is apt to be more sensitive than another man," he says, "because he is more exposed. He is a bit of sensitized paper, so to speak, receiving and giving off impressions."

So constituted, he refrained from reading one of the criticisms in the morning papers. Friends jealous of his equanimity had warned him that it would be just as well not to; and with the rare simplicity that prompts unquestioning faith in the insights of friendship he had complied.

"I might be tempted to reply," he said. "But why do so? One cannot have the last word with a critic. I shall reply by trying to write a better play."

Not that he slights his present handiwork. He thinks "The Bachelor's Baby" a good play and has the boldness of modesty to tell you so.

"It is a rule of dramatic writing," he explained, "that you must make your audience laugh a little, cry a little and wait a little. I know I've got those three elements in my play."

He told me of the difficulty he experienced in getting it on the boards. Charles Frohman was skeptical of his dramaturgic power.

"My experience on the stage didn't help me one particle in getting my play before the public," he declared and every aspiring playwright should thank him for the encouragement implied in the words.

But he had written several plays before "The Bachelor's Baby" and he thought he knew enough and could adopt a sufficiently detached viewpoint to pronounce upon the merit of his latest-born. So he persisted. He was willing to shoulder the expense of a production. Finally Frohman relented.

"No doubt he thought the lesson of a failure would be the cheapest in the end," is the way Wilson puts it.

There was no failure. It succeeded before its first New York audience of professional folk.

"At a professional matinee actors may applaud out of politeness, but politeness will not make them weep and it will not make them laugh," says Wilson. "And at that performance they laughed. The play ran for eight months in New York. I had to come to San Francisco to learn that it was a failure."

There was no bitterness, only amusement; no tone of superiority, only a little honest resentment in the words. The golden smile that went with them interpreted for him.

FRANCIS WILSON

It is bracing for the critic to be douched occasionally with the cold water of an actor's retort. And when the douche is given smilingly but firmly, as by Francis Wilson, there is a tonic in it for rundown sympathies. Your critic needs a tonic in the springtime, like some other folk. And how I would like to see Wilson spooning treacle and sulphur to a refractory critic! In unargumentative intercourse the gold of him is malleable enough, but he could be hard and unimpressionable to prejudice, I imagine, in the give and take of controversy.

"Charles Lamb," he reminded me, "wrote that the first condition of criticism is sympathy."

And all criticism that is legitimate Francis Wilson criticizes sympathetically. Apparently, when there are friends about to warn him, he does not read the other sort. He would much rather answer the purveyors of it by ignoring them—or by writing a better play.

"Like playwriting? I like nothing so much. I am like a dog on any trail I follow; I never let up. And I've followed this trail for many years. I have studied dramatic literature from its beginnings. I have done the Aristotelian stunt and the Freitag stunt and of course I know books like Cibber's Apologia. Brander Matthews' Life of Moliere I have found a most illuminating book. But Price's Technique of the Drama is the book I have found most valuable. I've chewed up a dozen copies of it. See how I annotate it and shoulder-note it and scribble the fly leaves.

"I write all the time. I keep a book by me always and jot it full of suggestions. Everything I read suggests something for the plot of a play. Matthews' Moliere I found full of suggestions. But Moliere has always been a source of inspiration to me.

"His plays teach the dramatist that the vitality of all drama lies in the motives of men; in the making of a biting portrait, if you please, of life as it exists now. There was a time when we accepted French plays, English or German plays, all representing existences not our own. But we have learned that what a public wants is what Moliere discovered the public wanted in the seventeenth century, stories of itself.

"I read Ibsen, Strindberg and the rest. But my nature rebels against the tragic in them. I have no sympathy for their note of pessimism. My nature is optimistic."

The dry bones of a conversation, these, a conversation which he richly draped with well considered phrases, vivacious gesturings, lively turnings and twistings in his chair, sudden dartings here and there about the room. And he sunned it all with that golden smile while his gentle voice rippled along and his eyes sought the responsive flash in the eyes of his hearer.

He has been confirmed with the chrism of that gentlest of all faiths, bibliophily; one can see that in his instinctive fingering of books as he talks. And he likes to illustrate his talk with scrappy readings—what this author or that had to say and what he "shoulder-noted" in the margin.

One book he had at hand was Leon Vincent's Moliere. Vincent is his friend and dedicated the book to him and he is annotating it to the confusion of Vincent's theories. I glanced at some of these obiter dicta. Where Vincent wrote: "In such a theater the hero of tragedy might find his performance interrupted by 'the braying of an ass or the bellowing of a bull,'" Wilson had commented: "To such music the Christ was born."

A cynic might have pencilled something about a critic.

The Prisoner

By Jean Riebrach (From the French)

The inn, which was frequented by carriers and peddlers, also served as a meeting point for the two brigades of mounted police. The lights from the windows shone out upon the road, and Lomme, the elder of the two mounted police, said:

"They are already there. I can see the horses."

Their own animals broke into a trot and then stopped of their own accord before the door. Lomme and his comrade Prache, dismounted, welcomed by the men of the other brigade. Cordial voices mingled with the jingling of sabres. Hands were shaken, and spurs clicked upon the stone floor.

"Anything new?" Lomme asked.

"Nothing," answered his companion. "Only a prisoner to be transferred."

By a motion of his thumb over his shoulder he pointed out a boy, haggard and ragged, seated in a corner. Lomme's eye followed the gesture but just then someone handed him the warrant of arrest. He cast his eye upon it carelessly and read: "Robbery, followed by attempted murder. Description of the accused: medium forehead, ordinary nose." He folded up the sheet. "All right, all right," he said as he slid it into his pocket. Then, before accepting the glass held out to him, he delivered a receipt and signed the register on a corner of the table. The two men did not linger, for they were anxious to get home.

Meekly the prisoner held out his wrists for the handcuffs, and, the guards swinging themselves into the saddles, he set off, walking between the two horses.

A question rose to his lips. "Is it far, gentlemen, to your brigade headquarters?"

He spoke politely. Lomme, who was holding the end of the chain, answered:

"Two short hours."

The answer encouraged the prisoner. He began again, very humbly: "Perhaps, gentlemen, you could tell me—M. Goiraud, the farmer, you know, the one I—I would like to know, because—if he should get well it wouldn't be so bad for me."

"No," declared the officer, "I can't tell you that."

Silence fell upon them. In the moonless night a few yards of the road could be distinguished ahead of them like a gray ribbon; the hedges on either side were a darker mass standing out against a dark sky; the feet of the horses fell upon the soft dust of the road, now cadenced, now commingling.

But the weight of the silence seemed to oppress the prisoner. He broke in again. "It's hard luck, just the same, that he came in on me. I wanted to escape, but he grabbed hold of me. Of course, I defended myself. There were blows."

He was talking as if to himself, slowly, not expecting approval. Then he continued:

"Kill him?—no, I never thought of it! Work—oh, the devil! It's easy enough to talk about working. I've done all I could, all sorts of odd jobs here and there. But when a man has no trade——"

The desire for sympathy, the longing to hear a human voice answer his own, caused him to raise his head and address himself to his guard.

"I, I never had a father; I grew up in the streets, as best I could, at Tours, in Touraine."

The talk annoyed the mounted policemen. Lomme seized the words, however, as an excuse for beginning a conversation with his companion. He turned to Prache.

"A fine city, Tours. I was in garrison there, dragoon regiment, before going into the police. Oh, I'm talking about a long time ago, more than twenty years."

He wandered on, evoking memories. He told where the cavalry quarters were, not far from the Loire; told the names of the officers, and of the colonel. Then he spoke of his classes, of the manoeuvres, that devilish horse he had to ride then. Amongst all these recollections there was one that would glide in, trying as he would to crush it out. There was, not far from the barracks, a cafe where Marie Champeau, as pretty and as joyous as a May morning, waited upon the customers. His fine presence had won her heart. At the very outset he had promised to marry her—how can one hesitate to promise anything in moments when desire darts fire through your veins? It's only afterward, when one becomes sobered, that one can reason about it, especially when there's something else in the story—a child. Yes, that had been his case, and he just about to get into the police! what the devil could he have done with the child? Well, of course, he had had his own share of worries; he had had to conceal his departure, flee, in fact, from the little woman; then, afterward, when his comrades had told her his address, she had written to the barracks at Lobau, threatening to tell his chief.

Lomme became calmer when he reflected further that after all everything had been arranged. After a while the letters ceased to come. He had heard nothing more. Then he had married a woman whose father had some money. He had two children now, ten and twelve years of age; fine boys, already taking prizes at school. Yes, everything arranges itself in this life.

The voice of the prisoner again came to the ear of his guard. "Oh!" said he, "I know it well, barracks of the cavalry. The woman that brought me up lived near there. She was an aunt of my mother's; because, I must tell you, my mother worked out and couldn't take care of me."

He went on, a strain of painful eagerness in his voice.

"They paid her, of course. That's why, when my mother died at the hospital, the old woman threw me out. And then I went to Saint-Avertin, where she had some relatives."

Lomme trembled. She was from Saint-Avertin—Marie Champeau:

"It's a little village," interrupted the prisoner. "Perhaps you know it?"

"I know—that is to say—yes, of course."

"But it was the devil's luck!" the other continued. "They were dead, both of them, father and mother Champeau."

It seemed to please him to repeat this name, as if it linked him yet to something on earth; it was an anchor, thrown out into the dark sea of his wretched past.

"Yes, Marie Champeau was my mother's name. Me, I'm Louis; you saw that, perhaps, on your paper. Oh, they were well known in the neighborhood, the Champeaus. You may have heard them spoken of sometime?"

"No," answered Lomme.

His voice was that of a man who is strangling. So great was his pallor that it seemed almost like a dull light in the darkness about him. His horse stumbled. He drew it up and his thoughts began to go round and round like a wheel inside his skull, hammering out the words:

"She! Louis—our child!" The end of the thin chain by which he was leading the prisoner fell from the man's hand. A kind of horror prevented him from picking it up. He told Prache to take it, under pretext that he wished to light a pipe. And the wheel kept turning: Their child—his child—robber—assassin—in prison—in the galleys—perhaps on the scaffold!

Absurd ideas came to him. He imagined that the captive might escape, thus avoiding his punishment. But to what end? They would quickly recapture him. A sudden solicitude made the man ask:

"Your handcuffs are not too tight, my boy?"

"No, I can get along."

There was silence again. Prache whistled for a moment; then he too was still. The hedges traced their inky line against the heaven, the little ribbon of road passed and was left behind incessantly. Trees seemed to glide by, one by one. At the sound of the horses' hoofs upon the roadway, a dog began to bark; then there was only the monotonous creaking of the saddles, the regular footfall of the horses. All else slept.

The man did not dare look down upon the prisoner, who was but a blur of shadow upon the ground. But in thought he followed him through the galleys; then he saw him later, discharged, but dragging his sentence with him throughout his life, like a ball and chain riveted to his soul; without a trade, without work, without bread. The memory of the other two, sleeping quietly at home, rendered his suffering more acute, and it was as if a mill stone were weighing upon his heart, crushing it, breaking it down.

From time to time he spoke a word of encouragement: "We're getting there. We'll be there soon."

But all this did not satisfy him. He was seeking for some act, some word by which it might be possible to repair, even if never so little, the irreparable.

When the iron shoes of the horses rang upon the pavement of the town the minutes began to fly with greater rapidity. He thought of giving the boy some money, some tobacco.

Finally he remembered something, for as Prache followed the horses to the stable, Lomme said, as he gently removed the handcuffs:

"You know, he is not dead. The warrant says only 'attempted murder.'"

"Ah," whispered Champeau with a sigh of relief. "I like that better."

"Yes," said Lomme in a pleased voice, "that is better."

Bending over, he guided the prisoner to the cell, across the court-yard. The latter said, a little awkwardly:

"All the same, I'm very much obliged to you for telling me."

Without answering, Lomme opened the cell door. When he closed it upon the prisoner he turned the key without a sound. One would think it was a mother, drawing together the curtains on the cradle of her first-born. Then he went away, walking softly, like a thief.

His wife, upstairs, did not awaken. In the next room he could hear the regular breathing of the two boys. They, at least, were happy. He saw them, in turn, growing up, going through

The Kaiser on Suicide

When a German military "council of honor" recommended that a count be dismissed from the army without military rights, privileges or benefits because he had, among other reprehensible actions, attempted to commit suicide, the Kaiser refused to aprove their recommendation. In the verdict of the council it was found that "attempted suicide should be regarded as a substantial infringement of the oath to the colors." The Kaiser dissents from this. "For such an act," he says, "the person in question has to answer to God and his conscience. It cannot be submitted to the jurisdiction of a court either of law or honor, except in virtue of accompanying circumstances." The German criminal code ignores suicide. What has been described as a "general chorus of approval" has greeted the Kaiser's dictum in Berlin.

Monna Lisa Questioned

From Madrid comes the assertion that the Monna Lisa of the Louvre, the wonderful portrait by Leonardo da Vinci which has captivated art lovers for centuries, is not the original Monna Lisa of da Vinci, but either a replica or a later portrait of the same lady. It is claimed that the original is in the Prado Museum of the Spanish capital. Suppose it is so. What then? A painting is surely as good as it looks. It is the Louvre picture, not that in the Prado, which has "fascinated and perplexed the world century after century." The controversy which will rage about the assertion in favor of the Prado picture will interest only specialists; the rest of us will go on admiring the Louvre masterpiece unmoved by its history.

National Travelling Expenses

It has but just been discovered that the annual travelling expenses of the Government of the United States amount to $12,000,000 a year. This fact has been unearthed by the President's commission on efficiency and economy in governmental methods. The reason why it has been so long hidden is that no single account or bill has ever shown the total. The figures are tucked away in miscellaneous and contingent expense accounts of the various departments. President Taft's attention has been drawn to the large sum which it appears, on analysis, that the Government is paying for the official journeyings of its servants, and he is said to have expressed the purpose to have the whole business systematized. His private secretary, Mr. Norton, referred to the matter in his recent address before the Union League of Chicago, and stated that surprising differences had been found in the expense accounts for travel turned in by different departments. In the mere question of railroad transportation to New York and return, for example, it has been found that the empoyees of some bureaus can make the trip for 10 per cent. less than others. If there is thus a possibility of saving as much as 10 per cent. on the whole $12,000,000, the taxpayers are entitled to have it made.

American Rhodes Scholars

The opinions of Oxford "dons" regarding the Rhodes scholars from the United States have been published in the annual report of the Carnegie Foundation. They are interesting and illuminating. These scholars, say the "dons," are "attractive and attracted, but restless, volatile, and never educated with thoroughness." They are "in point of natural ability fully the equal of our ordinary open scholars; in point of energy, seriousness and force of character, decidedly their superiors. Their early training, on the other hand, has been less thorough, and of this they are themselves conscious." "They seldom or never settle down to do a long spell of thorough work. They have nearly all ceased to develop by the time they have graduated in the States, and do not really feel inclined to go much further." They "seem inclined to drift from one subject to another, taking a bird's-eye view of each, and resting content with that." "As a general rule they know nothing well, but know something about a great many things—the kind of knowledge you might get from attending public lectures." "Some are terribly rough intellectually, with little or no literary sense and very limited command over expression. In the composition of an English essay they have, as a rule, almost everything to learn. Their linguistic attainments are also, as a rule, slender."

Pittsburg and Smoke

Some of Pittsburg's strange millionaires have paused in their pursuit of the shapely chorus girl long enough to consider the advisability of getting rid of the smoke in their dun city. If they succeed they will at last supply the answer to that puzzling query, Why is a Pittsburg millionaire? It has been discovered that smoke is not only filthy but dangerous. It carries poisonous gases and the germ of tuberculosis. European cities have known this a long time. Manchester, England, is fighting it, after learning that in three days every square mile of territory during a fog was covered with 150 pounds of sulphuric acid and 1,300 pounds of soot. Chelsea is doing the same, and the matter of smoke prevention is engaging the attention of public officials and the progressive element among the people everywhere. In Germany the Government has appropriated $25,000 for lectures and courses of study on the subject, so the public may be brought to see the advantages, both economic and otherwise, that come from the abolition of smoke. What will appeal strongly to the Pittsburg millionaires is the fact that the elimination of smoke is economical. Getting perfect combustion is the necessary step toward a smokeless chimney and if all the fuel is consumed instead of part of it going into the air, money is saved. An example of saving is the plant of the Lackawana Steel Company at Lebanon, Pa., the workshop of 3,000 men, where there has been an increase of four hours a day in efficiency by the use of smoke consumers.

Did Charley Play?

Editor Charles K. McClatchy of the Sacramento Bee is taking a vacation in Europe and writing about in to the home folk. In his last travel letter he describes Monte Carlo. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that he muckrakes Monte Carlo. Charley never lambasted the "tiger" or Tom Fox more lustily than he lambastes the gambler's Paradise. Hearken to him:

Monte Carlo is a beautiful spot without and surely an Inferno within. Observation of the swarms of crazed men and women at the gambling tables is surely not pleasing. The thing is sickening. I have never witnessed a scene which forced upon me at once such a wave of pity for the victims, and such intense loathing for the fiend incarnate in control. On almost every face you could read despair—in almost every eye you could see the insanity of the lost gambler. Avarice and fear wrestled with their victims, and over them all Satan chuckled. I saw one old woman of over 70, tottering feebly on crutches, supported on either side by a nurse, take her seat at one of the tables. With palsied hands she placed her bets, while behind her corpse-like face her eyes burned as torches in a cavern. She was blind to everything but that table—deaf to all but the croupier's voice. Not even the whisper of God Almighty could have reached her. I saw a young and handsome woman leave the table after having evidently lost her last cent. The look upon her face was pitiful in its desperate tragedy. It meant either one of two things—suicide, or something infinitely worse. And I rushed out for a breath of fresh air.

Is it possible that Charley played and lost? Oh horrid thought!

Save the Park

Speaking of the proposal to hold the Fair in Golden Gate Park William Marion Reedy says in the St. Louis Mirror that those who are opposed to it "will find much matter in support of their contention in the status of our Forest Park before the Louisiana Purchase Exposition and after. They should have pictures of the wilderness that was destroyed for the Fair and the arid waste that has since existed there. Also they should know how this city's chief reminiscence of the Fair of 1904 is an Art Museum on an inaccessible hill. San Franciscans should save their Golden Gate Park."

A Scandal About Queen Elizabeth

Bram Stoker says he has discovered that Queen Elizabeth was a man. This is interesting if true. But it will be a difficult thing to substantiate, the only individual who could definitely settle the point having been dead for a very long time. Many historians have questioned Queen Elizabeth's right to the title of the Virgin Queen, but this is the first time that her sex has been disputed. We all know from our reading of English history that she was a good deal of a virago, using the word in the popular sense; but whether she was also a virago in the scientific acceptation of the term will probably never be determined. The Stoker story of the substitution of a male child for the female offspring of Henry and Anne Boleyn is not likely to be taken seriously. There are too many stories of the sort and impartial investigation has usually relegated them to the histories compiled by Grimm and Hans Christian Anderson. If Elizabeth was a man, what becomes of the pretty well authenticated tittle-tattle about Essex and Leicester? Must the annals of her whole reign be rewritten? Must the suffragettes be deprived of a shining example of woman's ability to rule? Personally I think the Stoker story will be proved at about the same time that the Baconians succeed in casting Shakespeare from his pedestal and that is a revolution scheduled to occur during the Greek Kalends.

The Spectator

Joe Redding, "Pote"

Always eager to acclaim the appearance of a new poetical star in our section of the heavens, I rise to lead three times three and a tiger for Joe Redding of the Bohemian Club and the Metropolitan Opera House. The luster of all our luminaries from George Sterling to James Henry MacLafferty pales before the blinding effulgence of Joe. This white irradiance of Joe's is shed all over the libretto of "Natoma," which lies corruscating with versicular gems before me. Let me dip a reverend hand into the treasure box and extract a jewel. This one sparkles in the first lyric of the first scene of the first act:

When as a youth I led my bride
O'er mountain-chain and oceantide,
We dreamed a while to here remain,
Afar from our beloved Spain.

Compared to which the immortal

When I was a lad I served my term
As office boy in an attorney's firm pales its ineffectual fires. Seldom do "potes" achieve the split infinitive; never have they achieved it so gloriously as our Joe. 'Tis the "pote's" license boldly lifted to licentiousness.

Prayer and Abalones

Injuns must talk in trochaic tetrameters. That was decided once and forever when Longfellow wrote "Hiawatha." So this is the way Natoma talks:

And he prayed unto the Spirit,
To the Spirit of the mountain,
To the Spirit of the waters.
And lo, his prayer was answered.
At his feet in untold numbers,
Tossed up by the mighty ocean,
Found he there the abalone,
Rich with meat the abalone.

"And lo, his prayer was answered" defies scansion, but the injuns from Uncas to Geronimo were a defiant breed. What is metre to an abalone fisher? Yet it must be said that Joe has not exhausted the possibilities of the Longfellow sing-song. Why could he not have done something like this, for Mary Garden to chant?

He killed the noble Mudjokivis,
With the skin he made him mittens,
Made them with the fur side inside,
Made them with the skin side outside;
He, to get the warm skin inside,
Put the inside skinside outside;
He, to get the cold side outside,
Put the warm side fur side inside;
That's why he put the fur side inside,
Why he put the skin side outside,
Why he turned them inside outside.

Broncos and Kneeling Bulls

But Joe is more wondrous still in his vaquero verses. List to this fearsome strain:

Who dares the bronco wild defy?
Who looks the mustang in the eye?

Reminiscent, is it not? Where have we heard that lilt before? Ah, I remember.

Who took me from my warm, warm cot
And——

But the rest had better be silence. There is no stopping Joe in this vaquero vaunting. He rushes on:

See where the bull upon his knees
Snorts when his neck we tighter squeeze.

'Tis the perfect picture of a yegg garroting a policeman. Versatile is Joe. Hear his tars singing:

We round the Horn and laugh to scorn
Old Scylla and Carib.
We stick our nose wherever it blows
And never stow a jib.

Joe is as hardy as his tars. He never muffs a rhyme. When a word doesn't fit in his Procrustean bed of verse he chops it. He adds abbreviation to the beauties of lyric verse.

Blow, Boreas, blow!
Old Neptune, shake your locks!
We'll trim our maid in her daintiest braid
And flaunt her prettiest frocks!

When Joe comes home they should make him an honorary member of the Indoor Yacht Club.

The Locus of a Kiss

By the way, the libretto of "Natoma" seems to spoil a pretty press agent story. We were told that when Mr. MacCormack, the tenor, kissed Miss Lillian Grenville, the soprano, at the end of the second act, he kissed her with such ardor that the asbestos curtain descended of its own accord. Mrs. MacCormack, the story went, was consumed with jealousy because her tenor-husband had never kissed her that way. But what says the libretto? "One kiss upon those tell-tale eyes!" Was ever soul-kiss implanted on the eyes? Soul-kissers answer in the negative. So the tenor's kiss on those "tell-tale eyes" couldn't have been as ardent as the press agent asked us to believe. On second thought, however, there may have been something in the story. Stage lovers may not kiss by the book. Joe's libretto may not appeal to them. Which would not be surprising. They had to learn Joe's lyrics.

Will Germany Exhibit?

Information of the most serious importance to the directors of our World's Fair was contained in a recent cable from Berlin to the New York Times. It was to the effect that Germany would not exhibit at the fair. "From an authoritative source" the Times' Berlin correspondent professed to know that German interest in the Fair would be "of a wholly secondary character." The Kaiser's fleet, it was stated, will undoubtedly be represented appropriately in any international naval spectacle which may be held to inaugurate the exposition, but "the German manufacturing and industrial world is not likely to take an active interest in the direction of exhibits. California, it seems, is regarded as too far away from the Fatherland for any practical results commensurate with the cost of sending and installing exhibits. It is pointed out that Germany, from a commercial viewpoint, has only a minor interest in the Panama Canal. The correspondent says that her exports to the Far East will continue to be dispatched by way of Suez, although the transport of German wares to the western coast of South America will be facilitated by the Isthmian waterway. It is added that the feeling in Germany is that the Japanese are likely to reap most of the laurels and substantial benefits from the exposition and that the Fatherland, as at present minded, does not think it worth while trying to despoil Nippon of her prospective advantages. That phrase, "as at present minded" probably supplies the leaven of hope in this mess of discouragement. Certainly our Fair directors have their work cut out for them.

San Diego's Troubles

Down in slumberous San Diego they are already having their exposition troubles. There is war in the camp of the promoters and accusations of treason have been bandied. It has been charged that some of the men who obligated themselves to help make the San Diego exposition a success are now endeavoring to kill the whole project to the end that San Francisco may have unimpeded swing. Mr. E. Foucher who was appointed foreign correspondent of the San Diego exposition when the scheme was in the first blush of enthusiasm is particularly aggrieved. In a letter to the San Diego Union he complains of an apathy among the directors and states that "in California, even in La Cajon, there are now people who think we are out of the game." He says that when he urged on the general secretary of the project, L. G. Monroe, the necessity of getting busy he received the "stupendous answer," "We must wait for San Francisco to act. This proposition will create more expenses, and furthermore, Colonel D. C. Collier told me he did not know if he wanted to have foreign exhibits in San Diego." As Foucher had been actively lining up foreign countries, he was very much put out by this application of the wet blanket. What is the matter down in San Diego?

The Swatting of Lawlor

It is to be hoped that Judge Lawlor and the Boughten Bulletin have not had another falling out, but these congenial souls whose friendship was engrafted on a stock of reciprocal confidence and taste have filled their admirers with misgivings. In the columns of the Boughten Bulletin of late have appeared certain allusions and hints that seem to betoken an attitude of irreverence toward His Honor. For example when Abe Ruef was granted a stay of proceedings to wind up his private affairs before going to San Quentin, the Boughten Bulletin said that the only man in town who didn't know that Ruef was merely jockeying for time in which to erect another barrier of technicalities was Judge Lawlor. And the little judge as soon as he recovered from the shock vindicated his sensitiveness to newspaper criticism by hastily summoning Ruef to court and making new arrangements calculated to conciliate his capricious censor. A few days later the Boughten Bulletin made another bulls-eye with a poisoned dart from its inexhaustible quiver. Speaking of the graft cases it said that it would be futile to try them without "Jim" Gallagher as a witness and that there was no likelihood of his returning. Doesn't that look like a swat at the judge who for months has been postponing the cases on the theory that the return of Gallagher was an event within the bounds of reasonable probability? Lawlor, it will be remembered, flew into a passion when District Attorney Fickert based his motion to dismiss the graft cases on what is now avouched by the subsidized organ of the prosecution cabal. Indeed the whole cabal was transported with rage at the time when it was made clear that Gallagher had been set adrift by Burns and Langdon. How strange then that now it should be insinuated that Judge Lawlor's failure to dismiss the cases is a wanton abuse of power! Perhaps Editor Older is again working himself into the mood to characterize the distinguished jurist as somebody's doormat.

A Tribute to Judge Lawlor

On the day that Ruef's last hope was destroyed and it was finally decided that he must go to San Quentin, one of the papers published a photograph of the fallen boss in the presence of his judge. The tousled hair, the chubby cheeks and the Cupid's bow of Lawlor loomed large in the picture. A sympathetic old lady in Berkeley studied the cut long and sympathetically. Finally she sighed. "Poor Ruef," she murmured, "how sad he looks in the presence of his dear old mother."

Fromage d'Amador

Otto Irving Wise took his legal attainments to Sacramento last week and attended a hearing in the Governor's office, a bill in which some of his clients were interested being under discussion. In the midst of the debate a newcomer elbowed his way into the room. An assemblyman nudged Wise, nodded toward the newcomer and whispered in a reverential tone, "That's Caminetti." "What's Caminetti?" asked the lawyer. "A state senator," explained the assemblyman. "Oh," replied Wise, "I thought it was some kind of cheese."

"Did he fall for it?"
"Yes, he didn't tumble."

Argumentum ad Judicem

Tom O'Connor, the attorney for the State Board of Pharmacy, was prosecuting a druggist before Judge Treadwell for selling cocaine. The druggist's attorney argued that the complaint was defectnve because it did not name the person to whom the drug was sold. In support of this contention he cited a case in which a saloonman had escaped punishment for selling whisky on a government reservation because the complaint had not alleged that the sale was made to an Indian. "The case cited is not on all fours with his case," argued O'Connor in rebuttal, "and the attorney for the defense has merely cited it because he thinks it may prejudice your honor. He knows that your honor is an Indian!"

A Highbrow Romance

"Marriages made in college," declares Benjamin Ide Wheeler, "have proved happier than those made elsewhere. The value of coeducation is steadily becoming more apparent." Which causes our Poetaster to hazard the following:

He was a highbrow college chap,
  She was a co-ed meek;
He specialized in history
  And she was a "grind" in Greek.
They met each day in the lecture hall
  And admired each other's learning;
And soon their cultured souls were filled
  With unfamiliar yearning.
His history books he put aside,
  Neglected Green and Gibbon;
She shut her Homer with a snap
  And bought a pretty ribbon.
He whispered, "You are fairer far
  Than Clio, Muse of History";
She said, "I've read the Grecian bards,
  So love is not a mystery."
"I love you," cried the highbrow chap,
  "By all the kings of Dacia!"
And she, "You be my Pericles
  And I'll be your Aspasia!"
He answered, "If you'll teach me Greek,
  "I'll be your history teacher";
And so, on graduation day,
  They hied them to a preacher.
Their honeymoon was not misspent
  In love and silly kisses;
They had no time to spend that way,
  This Mr. and his Mrs.
But one sad day she took amiss
  His views on Magna Charta,
And when he tried to prove his point.
  Her words grew tart and tarter.
He lost his temper, raised his voice,
  With language vile he dinned her;
He even said she misconstrued
  A simple ode by Pindar!
Their dream of love was banished by
  This unromantic clamor
And when he hurled a lexicon,
  She cracked him with a grammar.

Our Most Accomplished Officer

As a result of our army "manoeuvres" along the Mexican border Major-General William H. Carter has been brought into the limelight. Which reminds me that in the army as well as in the navy the best known officers are not always the most efficient. In all probability there are many well-informed readers of the dailies and the magazines who never knew there was a major-general by the name of Carter till the army was ordered to the border. Yet Major-General Carter is admittedly the greatest organizer in the whole army. It was he that solved all the problems of organization in the Spanish war. He solved them at his desk in the War Department at Washington, and being at his desk the limelight never fell upon him. He returned to the line in 1904 taking command of the Department of the Visayes in the Philippines where he handled the Pulagain insurrection with the same energy and good judgment with which he organized the General Staff for Secretary Root who acknowledged in a report to the President his indebtedness to this zealous officer. Perhaps the most accomplished officer in the army, a diplomat and a soldier, possessed of an excellent literary style, as evidenced by his valuable books on the cavalry branch of the army, he is also a man of great bravery. In the Apache campaign of 1881 he won the medal of honor. At Cibian Creek while serving as First Lieutenant he exposed himself to a heavy fire of the enemy to bring in a wounded man. Major-General Carter may be depended upon to do the right thing in whatever field of activity he responds to the call of duty. If he was a long time getting to his present high station it was because early in his career he cultivated a taste rather for proficiency in arms than for promotion by politics.

It Was Like Old Times

Two decades ago there was a woman who sold carnations to the millionaires around the Palace Hotel. In those days when you saw a moneyed man in the lobby wearing a red carnation in his buttonhole you knew that he had bought it from the old flower woman for a piece of gold. Among the regular patrons of the "Carnation Lady" were Adolph Spreckels and John Lewis of Portland, at that time and ever since intimate friends. And so when Adolph Spreckels, the other day, entered the lobby of the Palace from the side door, as was his wont twenty years ago, at half after four, the hour when he could always be depended on to appear, and met John Lewis there, the old-timers rubbed their eyes. When they noted that he wore the old familiar carnation in his lapel their memories went racing back over the years. And when he held out a flower to Lewis, saying: "Here's your pink, John," they almost thought that the days agone had come again. Spreckels and Lewis both show the heavy hand of old Time, but sentiment still remains youthful within them and there was a wealth of memory behind the simple action. "I wonder how many of the old fellows saw that and remembered what it meant?" mused a newspaperman in speaking with Spreckels afterwards. And glancing about he was surprised to see, in their old familiar places, Louis Lissak and Banker Sam Murphy, white and bent, and Hervey Lindley, graying now but a youngster two decades ago, and Admiral Reiter, and Al Henderson, the Palace porter who seems to be no older for the passing of twenty years and who now gets a tip of fifty cents where he used to get ten dollars. The past is linked to the present in unusual fashion at the Palace.

The Stategic McNab

In the language of the turf Mr. Gavin McNab of San Francisco "put one over" on the veteran Los Angeles attorneys who tried to break into the Baldwin estate, a project that looked quite feasible, for they had a very pretty girl as a client, so pretty that it didn't seem to matter much that her antecedents were very unsavory. California jurors are famous for their partiality for the left-handed, illicit offspring of defunct millionaires with an unruly passion for fleshly beauty and a susceptibility to the seductive appeal of deep-chested sighs, the fascination of languishing eyes. So the attorney for Beatrice Anita Turnbull went into court with supreme confidence in the righteousness of their client's cause. They had stacks of evidence to prove that when Beatrice's coy mama was of an age to pass for the granddaughter of that old libertine "Lucky" Baldwin she fell with amazing facility a victim to his base, insidious wiles. And they had heaps of circumstantial evidence by which it seemed reasonable, despite the frail woman's past performances in the role of old man's darling, for the pretty daughter to boast herself the progeny of the lustful Turk of the turf. Apparently Mr. Gavin McNab, attorney for the legitimate heirs, had a hard case. With Mr. Garret McEnerney as his associate he went into court like one apprehensive of defeat but resolved to make the most of a weak case. All through the trial it was supposed there was nothing for the plaintiff to do but prove that Baldwin was her father. McNab disputed every inch of the ground and proved conclusively that Lillian Ashley Turnbull was one of the rankest perjurers that ever took oath in court. If he couldn't disprove the claim of paternity at least he could show that Mrs. Turnbull was at once a cold-blooded adventuress and an expert in prevarication, and that she well knew she was not "Lucky" Baldwin's wife. The reporters thought she was a wonderful witness, that she was thwarting McNab at every stage of the cross-examination and all the while he was weaving around her a web from which it was impossible for her to extricate herself. And when all the evidence was in then came the coup de maitre. Instead of joining in the submission of the case to the jury the attorneys for the heirs appealed to the court as it was their right to do to instruct the jury that under the laws of the State it was their duty to render findings as to certain facts. This proposition was argued both by Mr. McEnerney and Mr. McNab, and though stoutly resisted by opposing counsel who hoped to have the jury act solely on sentimental considerations, the defendants triumphed. The jury had nothing to do but find the obvious—that Lillian Turnbull was never Baldwin's legal wife and that consequently her daughter was not his legitimate child. Such being the case the plaintiff had no right to inherit. Los Angeles has discovered that the brainy McNab now that he's devoting himself almost exclusively to the law is quite as alert and resourceful in court as he has always been known to be in the field of politics.

Our Busy Patriots

The "Municipal Conference" gents who have come together to solve the municipal government problem by nominating fit men for office have excited considerable curiosity. Who asked them to get together? is one of the question one frequently hears in the haunts of men. Are they direct descendants of the three tailors of Tooley street? and Who told these busybodies that they are representative citizens with a cinch on public confidence? are among the irreverent questions of the hour which nobody appears to be able to answer. Thus does the perennial parochial spirit articulate its instinctive envy of the distinction attained by merit. Meantime the members of the Muncipal Conference, persuaded of the loftiness of their motives, are on a still hunt for the ideal man for Mayor. Rumor has it that some of them think they already have him in the person of William Denman, a genuine blown-in-the-bottle reformer of the academic school, who proved his fealty to the irrepressible Phelan-Spreckels machine when he became a member of that serviceable committee appointed by Mayor Taylor to whitewash the Graft Prosecution. Mr. Denman would undoubtedly make an ideal Mayor—from the standpoint of the men who regarded the good and beautiful Dr. Taylor as the embodiment of their ideals.

The Happy Consummation

William Denman, by the way, is one of the few civic patriots identified with the late unpleasantness who have not been taken care of. His old side-partner Kent has been sent to Congress; Grand Juror Sanborn has been appointed a member of the Fish and Game Commission; Matt Sullivan is on the Governor's World's Fair Commission; Joe Dwyer was appropriately appointed to the Harbor where his friend Biggy went to his tragic, mysterious death. Truxtun Beale has been made a member of the Board of Regents to succeed Judge Slack. With Johnson as Governor a patriot like Denman as Mayor and Danny Ryan as District Attorney Jimmy and Rudolph would once more be running the whole works by proxy.

It's an Old Air

Rudolf Friml is a great composer and was acclaimed by the musical critics a wonderful pianist when he first appeared in this country with Kubelik. He is married now and settled down at Los Angeles, but he runs up to this city occasionally to keep in touch with his musical friends here. When he was last in town he went to the Orpheum. The orchestra played "Every Little Movement" from "Madame Sherry." Friml was astonished to hear the melody. He went to Rosner when the show was over. "Where did you find that?" he asked the leader, humming a bar of the music. "Why, that's the hit of Karl Hoschna's 'Madame Sherry,'" explained Rosner. "It is, is it?" exclaimed Friml "Well, it's a Bohemian folk song. My mother used to hum it to me when I was a baby." It

An Atrocious Pun

The members of the Press Club who are alumni of Stanford had a dinner and high jinks at the club last Saturday night. Properly to spice the affair Gus Keene, a University of California man, was chosen as toastmaster. Keene is a polished speaker and his sallies were full of wit. But he made a pun. "We are glad to have well bred college men in the Press Club," he said; "and we know you are well bred because you have had a four-years' loaf." Whereat several tough gridiron heroes broke down and wept.

Fixing His Name

Peter B. Kyne, the young storyteller whose yarns are appearing regularly in the Saturday Evening Post, became a member of the Press Club recently. One day at the club he sat in a group of newspapermen, some of whom had never met him before. One of them miscalled his name and that led to a correction which in turn led to a discussion of the name itself which is an unusual one. "Yes," agreed Pete, "it is an odd name, a sort of betwixt and between name." "Why betwixt and between?" queried one of the reports. "It's 'a little more than kin and less than kind,'" explained Pete.

A Quick Shave

When the freak barber's bill was being debated in the lower house last week Assemblyman Milton Schmitt of this city arose and declared that one provision in it compelled his admiration. It was the provision, he explained, which prohibited a barber from shaving a man who was suffering from any blood or skin disease. "This provision will be a boon to the man who wants a quick shave," declared Schmitt. "When he rushes into the barber shop he will be stripped and placed on a marble slab. The barber will give him a thorough examination and extract a few drops of his blood. The customer will then be assisted in dressing and the barber will bow him out of the shop with these pleasant words: 'The blood test will be completed next week. Come back next Thursday and if the report is favorable we shall be delighted to trim your whiskers. Next!'"

That London Paper Again

I hear that William Randolph Hearst is once more considering the advisability of introducing his newspaper methods to old London town. Many years ago Hearst conceived the idea of starting a paper in the British capital, but the scheme remained in abeyance. But now it has been revived. Sam Chamberlain, one of the most trusted of the Hearst editors, is in London and it is said that he has bought for his chief a certain London daily which has been on the market. Londoners consider Lord Northcliffe's Daily Mail a sensational paper and call it contemptuously "the rag." What name will they find for a typical Hearst paper?

Englebright Still Sore

Ex-congressman Englebright is still sore about the shoulders from the drubbing which Judge Raker of Modoc gave him at the last election. I hear from Washington that a number of stories discreditable to Raker have appeared in the papers of the national capital and that Englebright is suspected of having inspired them. In an interview recently Englebright talked of the regret which the Democrats of his district feel over the election of Raker. If they had dreamed that they had a chance, he said, they would have nominated somebody else. Oh courteous Englebright! And then he wails thus: "Of all sad tales told after we came back here in December the saddest were about close elections like that in my district." Evidently all Washington is sobbing at Englebright's retirement. Meanwhile I can picture Charley Clinch of Grass Valley who helped to retire him, laughing gleefully at the ex-congressman's tears.

Frank Flint Provided For

Former Senator Frank Flint, it is interesting to know, is nicely fixed for the next two years. He is a member of the National Monetary Commission which is charged with the investigation of questions and problems relating to the reform of the currency and banking laws. This position pays $7,500 a year and will keep Flint in Washington where he will be provided with comfortable office quarters at the Capitol. It will not take up so much of his time that he cannot practice law and with the Interstate Commerce and the new Customs Court handling a great volume of business, there is a splendid opportunity for a good lawyer like Flint to build up a lucrative business.

The Drink of the Moment

Maurice Griffin of the Natomas and other million-dollar corporations has popularized a tipple which will work havoc with many a purse and many a brain if it continues the vogue. He had it brewed at the St. Francis a few nights ago and after a few applications the members of his select little party all burst out into poetry and song. It is the Imperial punch and costs one dollar and a half a glass. Two glasses can be mixed from a pint of champagne. I am informed that after the third round a well known newspaperman offered to buy Natomas from Griffin at any figure; and that after the sixth a husky man about town announced his belief that he could whip a streetful of chauffeurs. I have also been told that at this stage Griffin confided to his friends that he was the author of "Paradise Lost" and the Letters of Junius.

Dan Reid Has No Secretary

Daniel G. Reid, chairman of the board of directors of the Rock Island road and director in a score of million-dollar corporations, agrees on at least one point with the late E. H. Harriman. He happened to be telling about it at the St. Francis the day he arranged to cross the Atlantic in his private yacht and open his London house for the coronation festivities. Toward the end of his life Harriman decided that high-class and high-priced private secretaries were a nuisance. Reid has arrived at the same conclusion. He explains that in his experience secretaries invariably grow dissatisfied with their circumscribed sphere of activity after a brief period and demand that they be taken care of in some executive position more suited to their talents. The consequence is that the man of affairs is forever promoting one secretary to a good position and breaking in another for his private needs. Some time ago Reid decided that what he needed, for his own comfort, was a stenographer, not a private secretary; so he settled his last secretary in a comfortable corporation job and picked out a slow-thinking, slow-working, slow-moving stenographer. This man is still with him. I am not reflecting on his qualifications and I can pay him the compliment of saying that he suits Daniel G. Reid.

A Very Poor Joke

John Finnell who has a ranch at Napa and is a brother of Bush Finnell, the attorney for the Citizens' Alliance, was summoned a few days ago to the telegraph office in the Palace. The girl behind the counter held up a telegraph blank. "On account of the storms," she explained, "the wires are down and it has been impossible to send this message for you." Wondering very much, as he had sent no telegram that day, Finnell took the blank and read a message addressed to his wife at Napa, signed with his own name and asking that seventy-five dollars be sent to him at once. He thanked the girl for her trouble, put the telegram in his pocket and set about discovering who had attempted the fraud. He soon found out that it was not a fraud but a practical joke arranged by an inveterate practical joker of his acquaintance whose name is of no importance. Neither is this story, except that it illustrates my idea of what does not constitute humor.

Dick Tobin and Helen Gray

There is a persistent rumor that Miss Helen Gray will soon announce her engagement to Richard Tobin, but it is so far unconfirmed. However Burlingame is discussing it and it is said there is reason to believe a wedding will not long be delayed. Dick Tobin is the brother of Joseph Sadoc, Mrs. Charles Clark, Mrs. Raoul Du Val and Miss Agnes Tobin, and has long been a catch. He has a home at Burlingame where he keeps bachelor hall, and is one of California's crack polo players. Last year he broke his leg in the games at Coronado. Helen Gray is a beautiful young girl who has been greatly admired. One of her dearest friends is the Princess Kawananakoa who frequently chaperoned her to navy affairs at Mare Island. She is the daughter of the Harry Grays. Society is interested in the rumor and is awaiting definite news.

A Bridal Picture

The photographer imported from New York to take a picture of Mrs. Templeton Crocker in her bridal robes made one as well of the wedding party. It is a charming group of the fair young bride surrounded by her attendants taken at the Irwin residence the day before the wedding. Miss Irwin stands in the center in her cloth of silver robes with a lace veil framing her face. On her left in the picture is Jennie Crocker who was the maid of honor and next to her Marian Zeile. On the bride's right are Miss Marian Newhall, Miss Mary Keeney and Miss Julia Langhorne in their bridesmaid gowns and small hats. The exquisite color combination of pink and orchid tones is lost in a photograph. However it is a striking picture and each of the bridesmaids is cherishing one sent to her as a souvenir.

Digging Up the Past

One of the New York papers in its notice of the Crocker-Irwin wedding indulges in several tart references which were evidently supplied by some disgruntled San Francisco bavarde. "It is a far cry," comments this paper, "from the present status of the holders of the Crocker and Irwin fortunes to that of the founders of them." "Helene Irwin's father began as a clerk," it says as though shocked. And tracing Mrs. Templeton Crocker's relationship to the Ivers family it tells that Ivers pere was "a plain Irishman" while Mrs. Iver's "brogue was of the juiciest and could never be overcome." Who is muckraking San Francisco society for the delectation of New York?

Miss Schultz' Hat

None of the local belles is better equipped to wear the queer-looking hats women are affecting than Miss Elyse Schultz. Her beauty is of the fresh vivid order that stands the test of styles. She was a study in purple at a recent tea, the chapeau being a striking feature of the costume. It was of dull purple rough straw, helmet shaped and fitting closely about the face. Small mercury wings over the ears were the only trimming and most women would have looked like—what shall I say?—in it. The gown was of the same shade of satin with tight skirt and a short jacket and there was a purple parasol to complete the picture.

She Hates to Pay

A very well known matron in the bridge playing set is the subject of a story that is making the rounds of the tea tables. According to the chatter, when the time comes for paying her losses—and she generally loses—she has a sweet way of opening her purse, inspecting its contents carefully and remarking: "I've only twenty dollars in gold. I'll pay next time." But those who win from her complain that pay day never comes. Recently, however, she received a great shock, a very great shock. When she rose from the card table with her stencilled remark a lady who had won from her softly said: "Fortunately I can change that gold piece for you." There was nothing for our artful dodger to do but hand over the twenty dollars. She was completely crushed when the other lady very demurely explained: "I'll take out the few dollars you've owed me so long." And she handed our crestfallen matron very little change.

Our Ennuye Kiddies

It is very amusing to note the bored and blase air of many of our young society chaps. Some of them have recently signified their intention of giving up society. I heard one of them say recently: "Society means nothing to me. It is an empty sham." As this lad never gave indication of possessing an original idea I presume that he repeated the remark from a book or got it from one of his elders. As he is almost young enough to spank his precocious pose is laughable. Two of our chappies, tiring of the restraints of family life, recently fitted up bachelor apartments in a smart and quaint apartment house in the fashionable district. I refer to Rudolph Bertheau and Harry Osborne. Their girl friends were very generous in contributing to their comforts. The first thing we know some of our fledglings will be living at the clubs.

She Has "Arrived"

The success of Kathleen Thompson Norris in the world of letters is an assured thing. That Mrs. Norris has "arrived" may be stated on no less authority than that of Ida Tarbell, who told a San Francisco friend that she had attained that enviable position where magazines solicited her work and were glad to get anything from her pen. Mrs. Norris has the freedom of the Atlantic Monthly that prints only stories or articles with a genuine literary quality and has recently published two of her stories. This month's McClures has another of her clever bits of fiction and a novel may be a new attempt. Mrs. Norris who is a sister of Mrs. Charles Conway Hartegan of the navy has lived in New York since her marriage to a brother of the late Frank Norris.

Miss Lundborg's Success

From friends who have recently returned from abroad I hear of another attractive girl who is winning laurels for herself. I refer to Miss Florence Lundborg, the daughter of the late Dr. and Mrs. J. A. W. Lundborg and sister of Irving Lundborg of Oakland. Miss Lundborg has recently illustrated "The Honeybee" for Mrs. John Lane of London and her work has received the approval of the very critical author and her publisher-husband. She has copied in the Louvre several paintings by celebrated masters and for some of them she has been offered a most flattering price. But she refused, preferring to keep the pictures for the studio which she intends to open this fall in San Francisco. Miss Lundborg will leave Paris this month for Italy accompanied by Miss Katherine Harker (another California girl) and after a leisurely tour of three months will turn face homeward. A few years ago Miss Lundborg decorated a cafe in Paris. This cafe possessed much sentimental interest for her as it was kept by "Henrietta," an old woman well known in the Latin quarter for her kindness to the young California students. The work was done as a labor of love. Ever since the cafe has been a sightseeing place for visitors, especially Californians.

No Rent for Hays Hammond

Since the news came out that John Hays Hammond was going to be special American Ambassador to the coronation of King George, wild stories have been circulated about the enormous rent he was to pay for the Burdett-Coutts home which he will occupy. According to one of these stories Hays Hammond was to pay $60,000 in rent. It isn't so. John says so himself. "It reminds me," he says, "of the story of an old Scotchman who visited London. When he returned a friend asked him how he had enjoyed it. 'Weel, I had a fine room at the hotel,' replied Sandy. 'But, mon, I paid saxteen shillin's the day for't.' 'Saxteen shillin's! Weel, Sandy, mon, what a fine time ye must have had a-seein' Lunnon if ye stopped in such a fine place.' 'Seein' Lunnon? And me payin' saxteen shillin's for a room? Hoot, mon! How could I have got the worth o' my saxteen shillin's if I hadn't stayed in my room all the time?' That is about what would have happened to me if I had had to pay $60,000 for a few weeks rent of a house."

Burdett-Coutts His Friend

Burdett-Coutts, the widower of the late Baroness, is a close friend of Hays Hammond. The Baroness was the godmother of his little daughter and the Hammonds used to see a great deal of her in England. When last in London Hammond happened to mention to Burdett-Coutts that he was looking for a house for coronation time. "Now look here," said Mr. Burdett-Coutts, "if you go about looking for a house you will find people trying to get the best of you, and you will have to pay a terrible price for anything desirable. Now there's my house in Piccadilly, just take it and stay in it as long as you wish, and you are welcome to it." Mr. Hammond said he wanted to pay rent, otherwise he would not feel comfortable. "Bosh!" said Mr. Burdett-Coutts. "If you insist you can pay for whatever alterations you may wish to make, and take over the servants," and that is the way the house to be occupied by the special American Ambassador was "rented for $60,000." Mr. Hammond thinks in view of the circumstances it is particularly hard on Mr. Burdett-Coutts for the idea to have got about that the latter is doing his old friend to the tune of $60,000.

Miss McMullin's Good Fortune

Miss Eliza McMullin who is going to the coronation with the Hays Hammonds is an envied girl these days. She will enjoy her stay in the Burdett-Coutts home. She will find there many memorials of Charles Dickens who was a warm friend of the beloved Baroness. She can look out of the window on beautiful Green Park with its constant smart liveliness and through the trees in the distance she can see gloomy Buckingham Palace. And she will be right next door to the eccentric Duke of Devonshire. By the way, Major-General Frederick D. Grant will be military aid of the special embassy and so Miss McMullin will see a good deal of Miss Ila Sonntag who is a relative of the Grants and will be with them. With her grandmother, Mrs. Julius Reis, Miss Sonntag will soon leave for England.

The Status of Americans in London

As quite a representative group of our society people will be in London for the coronation, the subject of the degree of recognition which will be accorded to Americans during that glittering function becomes important. It is being discussed in serious tones by those who will go and those who will stay behind. During the last reign, as everybody knows, Americans were made cordially welcome at the English court and ambitious American women took advantage of the opportunity to penetrate the mysteries of British official society. Our own Mrs. William Miller Graham was one of those who stormed the citadel successfully. But there are indications that Americans are not to be encouraged in their advances during the reign of King George and Queen Mary. A great many people, for instance, thought that two American duchesses, the Duchess of Marlborough of the house of Vanderbilt and the Duchess of Roxburghe of the house of Goelet, would be selected by the queen to act as her canopy bearers. To help carry the canopy that shields the head of royalty on the occasion of a coronation is a tremendous honor, fit to form a subject of conversation for years, yea for generations. But when Queen Mary selected her four canopy bearers the houses of Vanderbilt and Goelet were smitten with disappointment and chagrin. The queen picked out four duchesses of English birth—the Duchesses of Montrose, Sutherland, Portland and Hamilton. Whenever a queen does anything, no matter how trifling it may seem, diplomatic tradition requires that its consequences be pursued in all their ramifications in order that its hidden meaning and effect may be relentlessly hunted out. In pursuance of this method the experts are sifting the significance of this so-called slight to the American duchesses and they give it as their opinion that Queen Mary doesn't approve of the American invasion of London society and will commence a campaign of expulsion. This will be severe on the Reids, the Granards, the Wards, the Crockers, the Miller Grahams and so on, provided it turns out to be true. We shall see what we shall see.

He Was in the Thaw Case

Craig Wadsworth who was a visitor in San Francisco last week once enjoyed a brief notoriety in connection with the Thaw case. He was secretary at the American Embassy in London during one of the fair Evelyn's sojourns abroad. At the trial in New York his name was mentioned as one who had befriended Mrs. Thaw in England and it was proved that the friendship was no more than an official acquaintance. He is prominent in the Newport set of New York and has serious political ambitions. Peter Martin gave a dinner for him before Mr. Wadsworth sailed for the far east on Tuesday.

What Is the Younger Set?

A correspondent asks me to answer the above question. I am glad she asked, for it is a matter to which I have given some thought. The term "younger set" resembles caoutchouc—it is so elastic. It may be applied to members of the Entre Nous cotillon club or to members of the Greenway Assemblies. It is to be found in newspaper accounts of dances in Burlingame and church entertainments in the Potrero. Sometimes it is an exact description; sometimes it is a euphemism. There is a distinct "younger set" in society to which the maids of smart families belong; there is another "younger set" which belongs nowhere except in the imaginations of the professional bavardes. When a charming and cultivated girl who doesn't figure in the magic circle of exclusiveness announces her engagement the bavardes graciously state that she belongs to the "younger set." If they wish to fix her status, or rather, her lack of status, they add that she has not yet made her formal bow to society. Then everybody who understands the social argot knows that she is a social nobody. Crushing, is it not? But thousands of girls have survived the blow to become happy wives and mothers. The term "younger set" is also applied to young climbers. The purgatory in which they are confined while preparing for the paradisaical joys of Society is frequently called the "younger set." Really, it is a most useful term and very valuable. All society is a matter of words, anyway. Some old-fashioned people say that the only society worth while is the society of one's friends. That is a radical statement, not to be repeated in the presence of the bavardes. But it may give secret consolation to sensible members of the "younger set."

The Cult of the Weird Sisters

The very latest fancy of tired femininity in Paris carries one back to the wild scene on the heath in "Macbeth" and to the wilder Brocken scene in "Faust." The ennuied fantastics of the capital of the world have turned their pretty backs on the calendar of progress and are cultivating the dark rites of witchcraft. A College of Magic has been formed and the Black Art is to be studied and practiced out of the crazy volumes of Trismegistus, Agrippa and Dr. Glanville. As might be expected, California is prominently represented in this cult of the moment. California always has her charming representatives in Paris and they are tirelessly au courant—or should we say en rapport?—with the hobby of the hour. Who do you suppose I refer to? Mrs. Carolan? Certainly not. Mrs. Carolan is, if I may so express it, enfante de son siecle. (One simply must use these French tags when speaking of Paris—it is considered quite the thing, though English expresses the identical ideas quite as intelligibly.) No, Mrs. Carolan progresses, she does not retrograde. The dark backward and abysm has no charms for her. It is true that she has reached back a couple of centuries to pluck from their dead years the idea of a salon, but a salon is always modern. There is naught medieval about it. Mrs. Carolan has no desire to be a witch. The Californians to whom I refer are Mrs. Marie Russak and Anna Klumpke. Mrs. Marie Russak was here recently on a visit to her sister, Mrs. I. A. Beretta of Oakland. She is better known to us as Marie Barna, the beautiful girl who had the beginning of a great operatic career when she married a New York banker and turned from music to Buddhism and witchcraft. Anna Klumpke has been in France so long that some of us may forget that she was born in California. She was passionately devoted to Rosa Bonheur and has written much about her intimacy with the great animal painter. What a queer sight it would be to see Marie Barna and Anna Klumpke riding on broomsticks to a Walpurgis gathering. But no doubt these Parisian women will wear their witchcraft with a difference.

In the Social Spotlight

Preparations are all made for the sale of pencils at ten cents apiece for the benefit of the San Francisco Nursery for Homeless Children. The sale will take place on April 6, 7 and 8. Mrs. William L. Gerstle who is one of the active workers in this worthy charity announces that the sale will not be conducted like the tag-days. The pencils will be sold in offices, hotels, etc., not on the streets.

Francis Wilson in "The Bachelor's Baby"

By Edward F. O'Day

Shakespeare and Moliere were actor-playwrights. So were Colley Cibber and Davy Garrick. The greatness of Shakespeare's and of Moliere's dramas overtops their histrionic fame. Not so with Cibber and Garrick. We all know that these were very fine actors, but few of us have at tongue-tip the names of the plays they wrote. The trunk of history is carefully packed. In its accessible trays it carries only the biggest facts; you must rummage in the bottom for the less salient. So the plays of Shakespeare and Moliere and the acting of Cibber and Garrick are at the top, while the acting of Shakespeare and Moliere and the plays of Cibber and Garrick are at the bottom. It is a very convenient arrangement and worthy of imitation. But only the man who knows history at close range can accomplish the imitation. What will stage history have to say about Francis Wilson? There are undoubtedly wiseacres who know in advance, but I am not of them. Will stage history bury Francis Wilson's acting and preserve his plays? Or will it bury his plays and preserve his acting? It's a most embarrassing question and like most things that embarrass, interesting. It is easy to plead that the question is premature; that we have seen a good deal of Mr. Wilson's acting and only one of his plays; that his acting shows the improving effect of years while his play is the play of a beginner. But this is dodging. A mature actor does not handle the tools of the playwright with a beginner's awkwardness, especially if he enjoys intelligence as well as maturity. Mr. Wilson is a very intelligent man. The highbrows are proud of him. So even if his play were the play of a beginner, there would be no need to appraise it as one appraises the play of a tyro. But Mr. Wilson is not a beginner. Many plays by other hands have felt his influence. He has written scenes for himself into the works of others. And he has written plays which have not been produced. In the last respect only does he resemble a legion of would-be dramatists. There is therefore plenty of material for the fixing of Mr. Wilson's status. And I am glad to say that efforts have been made to fix it. I refer to the "prophesyings of the midnight lamp" indulged in by the critics of the daily press. The first whose opinion I consult will have none of Mr. Wilson as a playwright. He is superlatively denunciatory. Of one incident in "The Bachelor's Baby" he says: "If there is anything more incredibly inane on the modern stage I have yet to encounter it." Happy critic! What a lot of theatrical inanities he has escaped! Let us go a little further. We read: "The rest of the play is on a level with this." It would seem then that the play is the most incredibly inane on the modern stage which this critic has encountered. But the play has other distinctions: "The remarkable thing about it is that the author has managed to construct three good-sized acts without a single human being in any of them." As Oscar Figman would say, "I'm surprised." We learn too that the play has "lots and lots of lines," which is not revolutionary—"Hamlet" has lots and lots of lines—and that it "is divided into acts," which is hardly radical—"The Misanthrope" is divided into acts. But it differs from all good plays, says our critic, in that it has "neither dramatic action nor progress, shows no character drawing, consistency or continuous interest." At this rate there is no need to worry about Francis Wilson's status as a dramatist, for there is evidently no play left. But this is only one critic. There is another who is superlatively laudatory. He calls the play "the most human farce that any of those who laughed, and sometimes snickered through its three acts, have ever seen enacted." Here is a discrepancy of a striking nature. One critic has never seen a more inane play; the other has never seen a more human farce. Truth must be somewhere between. It is disconcerting to link Francis Wilson's name with the great names that adorn the beginning of this screed and then find that the critics are rendering us so little assistance. They agree, it is true, that he is a splendid comedian, but that agreement is of little assistance. What we want to know is whether he is better as a playwright or as an actor and the warring superlatives put us out. Perhaps we had better dodge the question after all. There is no room for doubt about Francis Wilson's ability as an actor; hasn't been any doubt about it for years. He is a comedian with a style that he does not have to copyright or patent, for there is none to imitate it. It has been brought to a high polish by the careful rubbing of years' experience; its strength lies in its concealment of strength. Sometimes perhaps the strength is too well concealed, as in the last act of "The Bachelor's Baby" where Mr. Wilson seems to outrun the demands of a sentimental scene, to overestimate the importance of being earnest. The baby fills the last act with sentiment and Mr. Wilson is as impressed as the audience. If he were a little less impressed would not the ends of comedy be better served? The play itself does not exact superlatives, damnatory or laudatory. Let us preserve a comparative degree of sanity by saying that not in a long time have we seen a more entertaining, a more touching, a more wholesome comedy farce. Let us say that it contains, not merely lots of lines, but lots of witty lines, lots of deliciously droll lines that do not always receive the mirthful reception to which they are entitled. Let us say, not that it is divided into acts, but that it is divided into three compact, swiftly-moving acts from which no single incident could be spared. If all this is so, the play is a good play. To get back to our disconcerting beginning, it may last as long as some of Cibber's and Garrick's plays which were all good plays. And if Mr. Wilson writes a better play next time, superlatives may be in order.

Gossip of the Theatre

The Great Busoni

Ferruccio Busoni is as stormily melodious as his own name,—Jove himself cannot play with the elements with more varying effect than this Italian virtuoso upon his piano. "Master of the piano" is a phrase that suggests itself very easily when listening to him, for he gives the impression of command over the mighty instrument so sullenly silent until magic fingers make it to sing and relate the wonder in its sensitive heart. There are pianists who seem to evoke only its tender, sentimental moods—make it sing only of spring, sunshine, soft rains, gay laughter and dancing and little children's prattle; or again of sad hearts, melting tears, woful resignation. But Busoni is not one of these. He makes you think of the great world, of battles, of parliaments, pageants, strifes, great mental achievements, triumphs. He fills one with a sense of physical energy, of the courage that strikes out for far-away horizons. And how does he do it? By that indefinable something within his artist's soul which finds expression through the medium of his wizard hands. He makes you bow to his industry, for it is no less than divine industry that has enabled him to surmount every technical difficulty of the piano. But so great is his technique that it never obtrudes itself as mechanical achievement, but compels the realization of its existence by orchestral effects and lovely singing tones, and sends you away from one of his concerts with a sweet memory of his miraculous tonal nuances. It seems absurd to compare him to any other artist famous as an interpreter of any one great composer. We should gladly accept him for his own great masterful artistry and rejoice in his vivid individuality. —H. M. B.

Ruth St. Denis Coming

The final week of the engagement of Francis Wilson in "The Bachelor's Baby" commences Monday night. The next attraction at the Columbia will be the widely heralded and much discussed dancer Ruth St. Denis. This star is coming here surrounded by a company of fifty and will have the assistance of a specially augmented orchestra in the presentation of her Hindu and Egyptain dances. Miss St. Denis recently closed her fifth New York engagement. It is expected that her dances will create the same furor here as in New York and London.

Marie Dressler Coming

The last performances of "The Merry Widow" will take place at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and evening. Then comes Marie Dressler in Lew Fields' production of the musical play, "Tillie's Nightmare," commencing Sunday evening. This entertainment played in New York for 389 performances. It comes in its entirety, traveling by a special train of nine cars. Miss Dressler who is one of the funniest women on the American stage, has a role peculiarly suited to her varied talents. Besides the twenty principals there are three score pretty singing, dancing and show girls.

Von Warlich, a Russian Master-Singer

Reinhold Von Warlich is a young Russian who was partly educated in his native land, partly in Germany and America. His father was the German conductor of the Imperial Palace Orchestra of the Czar and the boy was taught both piano and violin and became proficient on both before the age of sixteen. He then began the study of vocal music and for several years was under the tuition of the best masters in Germany and Italy. For the past few years he has been giving special programs in Germany, Russia, France and England with the greatest success. He has a voice of rare beauty and effective quality and is said to rank among the best concert singers of the present day. Uda Waldrop, a former San Franciscan, is traveling with the singer. His piano work has received the highest praise. Von Warlich will give two remarkable programs at the Scottish Rite Auditorium, the dates being Thursday night, April 6, and Sunday afternoon, April 9.

Attractive Fare at the Orpheum

C. William Kolb will close his engagement next week. He has certainly been making good. Binns, Binns and Binns, three comedians, will appear in a diverting act, "The Musical Vagabonds." Miss Alcide Capitaine, styled "the ideal gymnast" and "the female Sandow," will walk across the stage head downward on a ladder, suspended high in the air. Rowena Stewart and Gladys Murray will contribute a sketch of stage life entitled "Broadway Love." George Mullen and Ed Corelli are comedy gymnasts. The holdovers will be Miss Hamid Alexander, The Frey Twins and Stuart Barnes. New daylight motion pictures will be shown.

Here's Dick Swiveller

There are indications that the most gratifying week of Max Figman's season at the Alcazar will commence Monday evening when "The Old Curiosity Shop" is presented for the first time here since Lotta appeared in it about thirty-five years ago. Mr. Figman's version gives proper accent to every important character, with Swiveller mostly in evidence, of course, and the play follows the book as closely as is permitted by the necessities of the stage. The action opens in the Old Curiosity Shop and shows the escape of Little Nell and her grandfather from the clutches of Quilp and Brass. In the second act Brass' office is the scene, in the third the interior of the inn is displayed and the play closes in Swiveller's room where he is recovering from the long illness through which the Marchioness has nursed him. Special care has been taken to have the pictorial side of the production historically accurate, the artists and mechanics being guided by copies of the original Phiz drawings. To contribute to the atmosphere, Orchestra Director Lada has selected music that was popular in England during the period of the play, seventy-five years ago.

The Mischa Elman Concerts

Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist who makes his instrument as expressive as the human voice and who is without question one of the world's greatest musical geniuses, will give his first concert this Sunday afternoon, March 26, at the new Scottish Rite Auditorium. The second and only public evening concert is announced for next Thursday night. The third concert is scheduled for Sunday afternoon, April 2.

The Orchestral Festival Next Month

It has been the custom of Impresario Greenbaum to bring us one of the big Eastern symphony orchestras each year. He now announces a week's festival of music by the Russian Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Modest Altschuler. Fifty-two players and four eminent vocal soloists will come from New York to assist in the series of concerts. Six or seven concerts will be given in the Scottish Rite Auditorium and two special programs, one devoted entirely to modern Russian works and the other divided between Russian composers and Richard Wagner will be given in the Greek Theater under the auspices of the university.

George Friend's Farewell at Ye Liberty

Next week will be George Friend's last with the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse in Oakland and his friends are planning to give him a great send-off. "The Lottery Man" is the vehicle Manager Bishop has secured for his farewell. It will be the first presentation of the piece in Oakland. Following its run of one week Richard M. Hotaling commences his third season with the stock players, in "The Melting Pot."

A Critic on Mary's Play

Mary Austin's play "The Arrowmaker" has not been vociferously acclaimed by the New York critics. There is, for instance, the eminently careful Mr. Klauber of the New York Times. "The Arrow Maker" does not impress him. List unto Mr. Klauber discoursing of Mary's injun play:

"Mrs. Austin, who no doubt knows a lot about Indian manners, customs, clothes, either finds nothing in their lives to suggest a fresh and inspiring dramatic theme or willfully disregards it to present the old, old story of a fickle lover and his two loves, of a woman's disillusionment and vengeance. It is not apparent from what goes on at The New Theater that Mrs. Austin has succeeded in putting any genuine characterization into these Indian figures, in differentiating their motives, their emotions, and their actions in the essential things from those of the paleface. In the superficial aspects, in the rites and ceremonies, in the superstitions that gather about the medicine maker and her powers, one gets surely the result of actual study and knowledge of Indian history and tradition. But history and myth do not of themselves constitute a play, and they do not bring forth the dramatic aspects of a people. They are of even less value when they are combined with such a mass of unimaginative incidents and speeches as those which make up in great part the burden of this play. For, in spite of much paint and canvas skillfully illuminated to suggest a picturesque environment, "The Arrow Maker" is a burdensome thing. At times, indeed, it is ridiculous, largely because it is pretentious. That scene in which the heap-big chief Rain Wind, like the clergyman in "The Moth and the Flame," of earlier Clyde Fitch vintage, wants to know if any one may show cause why this man and this woman should not wed, is the final touch of unconscious humor in a presumably serious recital. Introduced here, this variant of the paleface marriage service is grotesque. But, then, much of "The Arrow Maker" is. And it is not the grotesqueness of something new and strange, but of the oft-repeated and familiar, misapplied."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There was very little doing in the stock market the past week although prices generally held up well and in some cases showed a slight advance from last week's level. The continued selling of Missouri Pacific to a new low level since the meeting for the new directors, was rather unsettling on speculative sentiment and undoubtedly was somewhat of a factor for room traders to force values down fractionally at the end of the week. In view of the long period ahead for physical improvement for Missouri Pacific it would appear that the stock is much too high and the recent advance has been taken advantage of by insiders who sold. Crop prospects continue very favorable and money is a drug on the market. The Mexican situation is not looked upon at the moment as a market factor. We find little further to say on the situation. Bankers are doing nothing and probably won't until the trust decisions are out of the way.

Wheat—Little out of the ordinary has developed in the past week but the time has arrived for the display of a great deal of uneasiness in several quarters. The season for crop scares is at hand and the ordinary speculator has found it the best policy to keep close to shore or trade for immediate profits only. Except for the fact that probably only strong people now own much wheat, it would be particularly anxious time also for the holders. It has been demonstrated plainly that the miller is more anxious to place flour already sold than he is to make more or to buy cash wheat. Only a serious and actual loss to the crop, of which there is no present indication, or a revival of the home or foreign demand remains to prevent owners of May delivery from facing the ordeal of a monthly expense account in the way of carrying charges on a lot of high-priced property. There have been a few export sales, very small ones, in the last week, of red winter wheat at Baltimore. This wheat was sold only a shade above the Chicago price and therefore the sales indicate little except how far this market is from an export call for a limited quantity of wheat. Before this market can reach that level, the Canadian surplus from the last crop will have to be reckoned with. Reciprocity will be a live issue after April 4 when Congress reconvenes and in the event of the passage of the agreement, now strongly probable, Spring wheat premiums will be wiped out and all values will be lower.

Corn—The market has been narrow, covering a range of about a cent and was influenced mostly by the action in wheat. Receipts are running rather light for this season of the year but the demand is also limited. Exporters are out of the market and the news from Argentine has been more favorable. Spring-like weather with occasional rains has helped pastures and the demand for feeding is small. It looks like a waiting market and of a scalping kind for the present.

Cotton—There was an undertone of strength in the cotton market the past week notwithstanding the indifference displayed by the speculative public to the increasing strength of the statistical position of the staple in the United States. Receipts of cotton at all points show a falling off compared with last season and the staple is firmly held at firm prices. Export clearances continue large for this season of the year and Manchester is reporting an improvement in the demand for yarns and cloth. The Liverpool market has the lead in the slight advance and spot cotton is in good demand there, quotations coming higher nearly every day. Spinners on this side however are not very anxious to buy at prevailing prices and they report the trade as extremely dull. Goods are being sold of 12½ cent cotton. The weather in the extreme south and west has been generally clear and cold with only occasional reports of showers in Texas. In the eastern part of the belt it continues dry and there is some talk of drouth. There is ample time for rain but as this is considered the rainy season in that section of the country, it can be expected most any time. Planting will be general in the next two weeks and it is generally predicted that the acreage this year will be the largest on record with favorable weather.

The Weird Excuse

Mrs. Parkinson of one of the main line suburbs met Mrs. Brown at a social function the other afternoon and in the course of their talk told her this story on Mr. Parkinson.

"Don't you know, Frederick did a very peculiar thing the other night. He came home from the club rather late, and of course I had retired. I didn't hear him go to bed, but some time during the night I heard a noise in the room. I awoke and was startled to trace the noise by sound to the floor under the bed. I was so frightened I screamed.

"Just then Frederick poked his head out from under the bed.

"What's wrong?" he asked

"What on earth are you doing there?" I asked in return.

"I must have been dreaming," he explained, "dreaming that I was fixing the blamed automobile." Wasn't that funny?

"Very," replied Mrs. Brown. "That's the night Mr. Brown and Mr. Parkinson went to the theatre together. Mr. Brown came home late, too, and went to sleep standing up in the umbrella rack, but he didn't have any weird excuse."

Auto Notes

Advices received by the Haynes Auto Sales Company from factory officials concerning the recent burning of the Haynes factory in Kokomo, Indiana, are of most encouraging nature. A number of factory buildings in Kokomo and vicinity have offered temporary quarters to the Haynes and the uninterrupted construction of the car will continue. This will be greatly facilitated by the fact that the forage room, experimental department and motor assembling rooms of the factory were saved from the fire. The parts department which because of the many years during which the Haynes has been built, was one of the most extensive maintained by any factory, was also saved. The offices too were untouched by the fire.

The local branch of the Diamond Rubber Company has just received an interesting photograph showing the wreck of a big touring car which disputed right of way with a fast express near Baltimore. The car is an almost unrecognizable pile of junk except for the four Diamond tires with which it was equipped. These tires show absolutely no injury.

The increased attendance at the Pioneer Automobile Company's second stereopticon entertainment which was held in the firm's salesroom a few nights ago, evidences the popular interest which these affairs are creating. The pictures thrown on the big screen in the rear of the room dealt with the manufacture of motor cars as illustrated by work in the Chalmers factory. When it is considered that the Detroit Chamber of Commerce in entertaining its many conventions, selects the Chalmers plant as the one most typical of that city's vast automobile industry, it becomes evident that the Pioneer Automobile Company is offering the public a real treat in these stereopticon views. The elegantly arranged display of Chalmers, Hudson and Lozier cars also added much to the entertainment.

Unusual interest attached to the 100 mile motordrome race between Teddy Tetzlaff and Ralph De Palmo in Los Angeles because it was the first motordrome contest ever entered by Tetzlaff who, because of his double Santa Monica victory this year, is recognized as one of the foremost road racing pilots. He drove the same Lozier car with which he set the world's stock car record over the Santa Monica course.

Let the Zerolene bear ride in your car. He kills worry, trouble and repair bills.

"When you find a better oil than Zerolene—use that oil."

"While the motorists throughout the country are praising the many novel features of Howard E. Coffin's Hudson "33," it is impossible to overlook that sturdy little Hudson "20" roadster," says E. P. Brinegar, the local Hudson dealer. "You know it was the "20" which swept the country so in 1909 that the Hudson Company established the record of doing the greatest business ever known to any automobile concern in its first year."

Exchange of Compliments

Smith and Brown, running opposite ways round a corner, struck each other.

"Oh," says Smith, "how you made my head ring!"

"That's a sign it's hollow," said Brown.

"Didn't yours ring?" said Smith

"No," said Brown.

"That's a sign it's cracked," replied his friend.

Slow

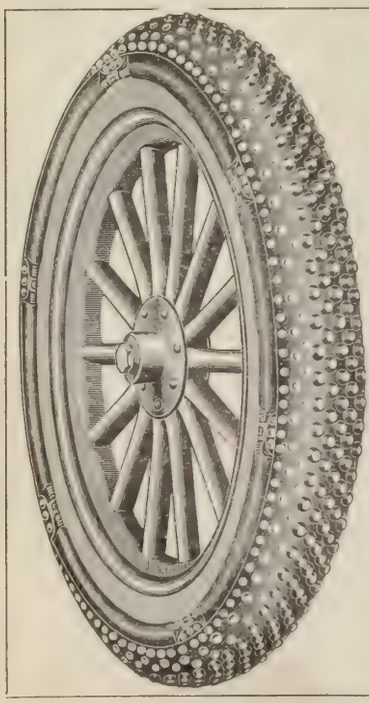
Two hunters, returning from the Catskills, decided to try some New York city humor upon the agent of a little railroad station in the foothills.

"When does the 3:49 train get in?" asked one.

The old man regarded him seriously and at length. "Wall," said he, "she generally gets in just a little behind the engine."

Later they approached him respectfully. "About time that train is due, isn't is, Uncle?"

"Yes," said the agent, "she's about due. There comes the conductor's dog."



Woodworth Treads

The Protector that Does Not Chafe or Hurt the Tire

There are many imitations; most of them will injure a tire more than they will save it.

The Woodworth Treads have been on the market for years, and have had the test of time.

They are puncture-proof, non-skidding and will save double their cost by prolonging the life of the tires.

They fit all makes of pneumatic tires. Anyone can apply them. Full directions with every tread.

Get Woodworth Treads, forget tire troubles, and have your Anti-skids always on the tires.

Send for circulars giving full description and prices.

Now Is The Time

To Buy

A Chalmers Car

Blue skies, spring's sunshine and hardening roads means that there will soon be a rush in demand for America's pre-eminent car—THE CHALMERS.

We can take your order now. A little later, however, we may have to tell you that we can get no more cars from the factory. This is no bug-a-boo cry to frighten you into an early purchase. We had actually to turn down orders last season, and with more than 60 per cent of the factory's 1911 output already gone you can see for yourself what later spring is apt to bring.

At least let us show you the 1911 Chalmers line.

life. The thought came to him that they too, might do as he had done. This thought grew: perhaps it has been this way since the world has been the world—that the innocent often pay for the guilty. The sentiment of fatality at once crushed and consoled him. He did not rise to the point of the consciousness of the incarnation of a Symbol; for now he saw only that far-off cafe and the image of Marie Champeau.

To wait upon the table she used to put on a white apron; sometimes a ringlet of blond hair would get loose from her cap when she bent over the table to laugh, and her bare arms showed a dimple just above the elbow. Then the man covered his face with his hands, and the tears trickled through his fingers.

The Guilty Party

"Who signed Magna Charta?" asked the school inspector, thunderously.

The village class sat mute.

"Who signed Magna Charta?" roared the inspector again.

"P-please, sir," wailed little Billy Smith, "it worn't me."

The inspector snorted. The class was the most ignorant it had ever been his lot to examine. He strode from the room and outside met the schoolmistress. Angrily he narrated the last incident.

"Who d'ye say said that, sir?" queried the mistress.

"William Smith!" snorted the inspector.

"Bill Smith," repeated the teacher. "Then don't yer believe 'im, sir. 'E's the biggest liar here! Yer may take my word fer it, 'e done it."

"My husband is so gentle and considerate."

"In what way?"

"Why, he wouldn't let me get a vacuum cleaner because it employed exhausted air."

Triangle Trip Over the Northwestern Pacific Railroad

NOTICE OF HEARING OF PETITION OF ADMINISTRATRIX FOR AUTHORITY TO CONVEY REAL ESTATE

In the Superior Court, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—Department No. 10, Probate. No. 10,347, New Series.

In the Matter of the Estate of GEORGE H. BUCKINGHAM, Deceased.

Order Appointing Time and Place for Hearing Petition Authorizing Administratrix to Convey Real Estate, and Directing Notice Thereof.

Mary G. Buckingham, the Administratrix of the estate of said George H. Buckingham, deceased, having presented to this Court and filed herein her duly verified Petition setting forth the facts upon which the claim of Winifred S. Bangs is predicated to be entitled to a conveyance from said Administratrix of said estate of all that certain lot or parcel of land situate in the City of Berkeley, County of Alameda, State of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Lot Three (3), in Block "D," that is to say: Beginning at a point in the Westerly line of Regent Street, (formerly Manoa Avenue), distant thereon One Hundred and Eleven and Seventy-five-one-hundredths (111.75) feet Southerly from the Southerly line of Derby Street, and running thence Southerly along the said Westerly line of Regent Street Fifty (50) feet; thence at a right angle Westerly One Hundred and Forty (140) feet; thence at a right angle Northerly Fifty (50) feet; and thence at a right angle Easterly One Hundred and Forty (140) feet to the said Westerly line of Regent Street and the point of beginning, as the same is designated and delineated upon a certain map entitled "The Berry-Bangs Tract."

And it appearing to this Court that said George H. Buckingham, deceased, in his life time entered into a contract in writing with said Winifred S. Bangs to convey said real property described in said verified Petition and in this Order, and that said George H. Buckingham died before making said conveyance, and that said Winifred S. Bangs was before the death of said deceased, and is now, entitled to a conveyance of said hereinabove described real property upon her carrying out the provisions of said written contract, and making the payments therein provided, and good cause appearing therefor,

It is Hereby Ordered that the hearing of said Petition be set for Monday, the 24th day of April, 1911, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m., at the Court Room of this Court, Department No. 10, thereof, in the Grant Building, in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California; and it is further ordered that a copy of this Order be published for four successive weeks before said hearing in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Dated, March 20, 1911.

Book Notes

Those in search of an artistic souvenir of California will look long and far before finding anything more satisfactory than the miniature "California Nights' Entertainment" of Charles Elmer Jenney. The little booklet is tiny enough to merit a place in a fairy's library and dainty enough to be kept in a glass case. It measures two inches and a half by three and a half and is bound in silk with gilt edges and rounded corners. There are sixty poems, all inspired by State themes, and twenty-one full page illustrations from photographs, making in all one hundred and sixty pages printed in beautifully clear type. It was a kindly thought on the part of the publishers, Valentine and Anderson of Edinburgh, to indicate the clan to which the various bindings belong, for the benefit of those who are not of the Hieland blood but still interested in the badges and distinguishing marks. In these days, when we are all intent on "booming California," the Acrostic which closes the collection, is worth wider publicity:

Ceylon, with its air spice-scented,
Arabian nights and their dreams,
Lebanon's cedars splendid,
Ice-born Himalayan streams;
France, with its rich wines flowing,
Ophir's mines of the metal pure,
Roman plains, and the olive growing,
Nile, and its desert's lure;
Isles of the Blest, and the fair Arcady,
All, land that we love, are blended in thee.

"Yozonde of the Wilderness" by Harry Irving Greene is a pretty if not particularly probable romance of an unknown white man and his Indian wife. Still it is not altogether impossible and for the sake of the principle involved one would like to believe it. The unnamed white man had committed a transgression which led his ladylove to banish him from her sight and he, feeling his unworthiness, started on a long trail to bury himself at a wilderness trading post until recalled, but his Indian guides, tiring of the arduous journey with its dangers, deserted him while he slept and left him to starve or win out as best he might. After wandering about the woods for several days the stranger came near an Indian village at nightfall and putting his knowledge of tradition to use he appeared amongst the people under circumstances which gave a glamour of the supernatural to his advent. Had he departed before dawn they would have looked upon him as a demigod and that had been his intention, but scarcely had he left the camp than he succeeded in killing a buck, and knowing that the tribe was on the verge of starvation he abandoned his course, returned to the village with his quarry and was made a prisoner at large. Deprived of rifle and hunting knife, and more or less under surveillance it was impossible to escape, yet there was no physical restraint upon his movements. His superb strength and skill determined the chief that he should be adopted into the tribe, married to his daughter and in time chosen as their leader. What follows it would be an injustice to the reader to divulge. Published by the Fitzgerald Company.

Since the rise of the cult of "Nature Study and the Animal's Friends," we have had dog stories enough from the human viewpoint. Here is a variation in the shape of a family history related by the dog, "Four in Family," of which the fourth, and decidedly the most important from the viewpoint of all the rest and himself besides, is the dog. "Four in Family," which appears to be a first book, is by Florida P. Summerwell. From the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

Harold Bell Wright has written in "The Uncrowned King" an allegory of life and its conflicts between reality and pretence, its subservience to Things and Traditions and the final triumph of truth. It is an exemplification of the homely axiom that "you cannot fool all the people all of the time" and sooner or later shams will manifest themselves in their true face, only to be rejected. With only a little over a hundred pages of print, in tint, illlustrated by John Rea Neill, with an attractive binding, title and decorations in gold, it makes a most attractive volume, good to keep and good to give. The Book Supply Company of Chicago has made of the mechanical part of the production a setting worthy of the gem it holds.

The address delivered by Rev. Thomas F. Day, Professor of Old Testament languages and literature at the local Theological Seminary, at the Presbyterian Church at San Rafael, under the title "The New Bible Country," has been added to the "What is worth while" series of the T. Y. Crowell Co. Dr. Day's view is virtually that of Epictetus, that men are concerned less about things than about their opinions concerning things, and the outcome of most of the discussion has left the good book just where it was. "The New Bible Country," bound in white with decorations of green and gold, presents an attractive appearance.

Exasperating

All afternoon Mr. Stubb had been moving pictures from one room to another, and his only reward was dust and perspiration.

"Hurry up, John," chided Mrs. Stubb, impatiently. "You will never finish at that rate."

Mr. Stubb removed the cobwebs from his florid brow.

"Woman, do you think I'm a machine?"

"Gracious, how funny!"

"Madam, may I ask what is funny?"

"Why, dear, if you were a machine you would be a moving-picture machine."

And then and there Mr. Stubb washed his hands and started for the club.

The little Society maiden who wished to be thought doggy commenced to gush.

"What a perfectly sweet Great Dane!" she babbled. "Of course you call him Hamlet?"

"N-no," stammered the matter-of-fact but badly smitten sportsman, "I—er—I couldn't, exactly. But"—seeing her face fall, and doing his best to be considered to have a poetic soul, he strove hard to justify—"I did the best I—er—could, so I christened her Ophelia. What?"

SUTRO TRACT

300% PROFIT

Will return at least 300 per cent and probably 500 per cent profit.

If you got twenty or thirty of your friends together and you all pooled your money and bought several hundred acres of fertile land in the center of San Francisco, and then you were familiar enough with the work to subdivide it and improve it by putting in winding boulevards, fine avenues, sewers, water pipes and every improvement necessary, and then sell the lots at retail at a profit of from 300 to 500 per cent, you would use every means at your disposal to put the proposition through so that you and your friends would make a profit—wouldn't you.

You can do this.

The RESIDENTIAL DEVELOPMENT COMPANY OF SAN FRANCISCO is a corporation formed for the purpose of buying the SUTRO TRACT fronting Sloat and Dewey Boulevards, Ocean and Corbett Avenues, containing 724 ACRES in the geographical center of San Francisco. Most of the land is covered with beautiful trees, the balance is rented for vegetable gardens.

The Ingleside cars pass the property on Ocean Avenue and two other car lines are to be extended through the tract. The Twin Peaks Tunnel will bring the property within 25 minutes of Kearny and Market Streets.

The shares of this corporation are offered for sale at the price of $100 a share in lots of from 10 shares upward. Many of the leading capitalists and business men of San Francisco have subscribed for this stock in amounts ranging from $1000 to $50,000 and aggregating over $500,000 to date.

You are invited to subscribe to this stock at the same price that every one paid—$100 a share. In so doing you are not only becoming a partner in the greatest real estate proposition ever undertaken in San Francisco, but you are helping to develop this immense trace of 724 ACRES into a beautiful residence district, thus keeping in San Francisco thousands of people who would go elsewhere in search of desirable residence property.

In other words you are pooling your money with others in order to buy an immense tract of land in San Francisco to improve it and subdivide it and finally to sell it at retail at a large profit. This is the ideal way to operate in real estate.

The money subscribed is not payable until sufficient stock has been sold to buy the entire holding.

For further information and for literature, call and see us.

IN A FAVORITE PART OF BERKELEY

$7,000—Extremely choice, modern 10-room residence on boulevarded street in Claremont Park, near north gate, close to two Key Route stations and electric transportation; construction, conveniences and the artistic features were all given the most careful attention by owner and builder; the living-room (16x20) has high paneling in natural redwood, built-in window seats, and with beautiful art electroliers; library (12x14) is finished to correspond and has bookcases, etc.; the dining-room (15x20), which is unusually attractive, has both the walls and ceiling massively paneled, the latter in addition to heavy cross-beaming; floors of these rooms are double and finished in polished parquetted oak; the kitchen is large and well arranged, has fine pantry, also pass pantry to dining-room; the bedroom on this floor, intended for a servant's room, has commodious closet, also running hot and cold water; the five bedrooms are unusually large, the two in front of the house being respectively 13x17 and 13x14; the woodwork on this floor is in a finish of white enamel throughout and the walls are newly tinted in most attractive shades; a sleeping deck 10x32, linen closets and a bathroom 9x12 complete the appointments of this floor, which can be completely severed from downstairs by the closing of a large door; there is a cemented basement containing laundry, furnace-room equipped with a splendid furnace leading through registers to every room of the house, and ample space for storage and also the addition of servants' quarters. The lot, 50x132, faces south and is absolutely free to the sun on all sides. House is in perfect condition and has recently been under lease at $75 per month; terms of $1000 cash and monthly payments of about $75 can be arranged. DODGE VER MEHR CO., 2015 Shattuck Ave., "At Key Route Terminal," Berkeley, Cal.

EDLINGTON COURT Modern Apartments Fifty to Sixty Dollars

These admirably located apartments, constructed with great care for the comfort and convenience of the occupants, are perhaps the most desirable renting accommodation on the east side of the bay. They consist of 5 rooms each and bath, the conventional arrangement is relieved by one of the sleeping rooms being built on outside porch. It is shown in the right of the picture with the canvas drawn. Modern in every particular; grand views, lots of sunshine, large living room—fireplace. The general arrangements of these apartments with their dainty buffet, kitchen and conveniences have quite captivated those who have seen them. Corner of Telegraph avenue and Woolsey street, a block from the new S. P. electric station and 5 minutes to Key Route. Apply to owner, 3100 Telegraph avenue, Berkeley, Cal.

TEN MINUTES FROM THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA—THOUSAND OAKS

This grand and beautifully wooded acreage, for years the playground of nature lovers and Mecca of picnic parties, is being subdivided for home sites. The landscape engineer has supplemented nature's profusion in this wonderful place so that the general contour of the country may not be disturbed. Situated on the western slope of the Berkeley hills overlooking the bay of San Francisco it occupies an ideal position for a home. These properties can be bought for from $25 to $35 per foot, all street work done. Directly accessible by the Key Route or Southern Pacific electric when finished. Apply to Newell-Hendricks, Inc., 2037 Shattuck Ave., Berkeley, Cal. Phone Berkeley 398. San Francisco office, Westband Bldg., 830 Market St.

A BEAUTIFUL ELIZABETHAN HOME

$30,000—Situated on a 6-mile avenue. This complete residence cost the owner $50,000. Located midway between Oakland and Berkeley it has the educational advantages found in a college town while the city is but a short car ride away. From the rear of this home an unrivaled view of San Francisco Bay can be had while from the front of the house the Berkeley hills mark the sky line. The interior finish is mahogany, while every modern convenience is installed. A rare offering presenting a combination of delightful residential and speculative features. The draperies and hangings go with the place. Thirty-five minutes from San Francisco. Laymance Real Estate Co., 1214 and 1216 Broadway, Oakland, Cal. Phone Oakland 328.

Thirty-Five Minutes from Town

$7,000—This substantial 8-room house—built by the owner as a home—is offered for sale. The lower floor consists of 5 rooms, the living and dining room being paneled and finished in subdued tones of brown. The breakfast room, kitchen, servant's room and a large back porch that can be used as a conservatory complete this floor. The second floor has three large bed rooms, the two rear rooms opening to a large covered sun deck or sleeping porch 27x14. The never tiresome Berkeley hills are the view from this porch while a splendid view of San Francisco Bay by day or the city sparkling in the night can be had from the front of the house. Heated by 2 fire places and furnace, lawn back and front of house, berry arbor and stable with concrete floor. A splendid opportunity—very desirable terms. Owner, 6652 Dana street, Oakland, Cal.

Breakfast Room

AN EXCEPTIONAL OPPORTUNITY

$5,500—This new modern house carries the old story "too large for the owner." It is built on a delightful corner, East of Telegraph avenue but in Berkeley, and is modern in every particular, consisting of 6 rooms with 3 bed rooms on the second floor, living room, dining room and kitchen on lower floor. The house faces west and great care was taken in its construction, the rooms being large and light. It is particularly accessible, being but 2 blocks from the new S. P. electric station, 1 block east of Telegraph avenue, 2 blocks north of Alcatraz avenue. Terms can be arranged. Owner, 2400 Woolsey street, Berkeley. Phone Berkeley 4641. Thirty-five minutes from town. (Inspected and recommended.)

One thousand dollars less than any similar house in Oakland; the greatest bargain on the market; get busy, save commission, buy from owner and builder. The Political Outlook

It is desirable to take our municipal government out of the hands of organized labor, not because of any quarrel with organized labor or any prejudice against organized labor on the score of its principles, but because class government is inconsistent with the principles of American institutions. It is both humiliating and injurious to San Francisco to be governed by men who acknowledge themselves to be the representatives of an industrial class, and whose allegiance to that class is such that they cannot be expected to deal impartially with all classes. But owing to the conditions peculiar to San Francisco it is no easy matter to alter the present state of affairs. Though the three-cornered contest for the mayoralty is a thing of the past, and though Mayor McCarthy represents a class that is in the minority he is not to be beaten by anybody known to be in sympathy with either of the two factions whose feud was the result of an attempt to regenerate the city by convulsion. While that feud lasts the demon of discord will be armed with power to do endless mischief. In the circumstances how absurd it is for either faction to take an active part in municipal politics! Even though a good man should be selected at a conference of the satellites of a faction leader his prestige would count for naught in a campaign. It would be assumed that the men by whom he was selected would exercise an undue influence over him in the event of his election. So there is nothing to be accomplished for the welfare of the city by any jockeying for advantage on the part of either faction.

Culture in America

A London editor has discovered that there is more culture among American women than among American men. Which dictum is in a sense a compliment. If from the British standpoint there is culture among American women then we are advancing, for when Matthew Arnold visited us he was in quest of the signs and evidences of culture and couldn't find any at all. But doubtless we are advancing. What may be considered in England prima facie evidence that we are moving and in the right direction is the growing popularity among us of the contemporary intellectuals of England and the vogue of Ibsen, Maeterlinck, Wagner and Nietzsche. To be cultured, according to modern authority, is to appreciate and understand the best that is said and done in the world. Accepting this as the test of culture the London editor is doubtless right. Surely not many American men are informed of the best that is being said and done in the world. Most American men are under the stimulus of a greed for wealth. They are devoting so much time to business and to experiments in democratic government that they have none to spare for matters of taste. The material everywhere overlies the spiritual. In American life the esthetic element is to be found only in spots; and these are sporadic. The men that take an interest in the intellectual pleasures of life have a vocation for the arts and are workers therein. Whoso tries to educate public taste must look almost exclusively to women for appreciation. To women the best in literature and art makes the most hopeful appeal; not the women of society, most of whom are frivolous, vulgar and uncultivated, but the women of the great middle class who attend concerts and lectures, who pursue culture not for its own sake but for the pleasure they get out of it. These women are mentally superior to their husbands and brothers, the practical men of America who regard esthetics as a bore. Thomas Jefferson believed that the time would come when Europeans of leisure would visit this country to imbibe culture, but the dawn of that halcyon period has not yet begun to glimmer. Europeans come to scoff and leave to flay, and all the while American gold is pouring into the art centres of Europe and returning for investment in stocks and bonds.

Our Great Chatterbox

Richard Brinsley Sheridan once said of a speech that he heard in Parliament, "It contained a great deal both of what was new and what was true, but that what was new was not true and what was true was not new." The same criticism may be justly made regarding the average speech of Theodore Roosevelt's. The Colonel abounds at once in platitudes and misstatements. This is not surprising. Indeed, it is characteristic of all incessant talkers. The spendthrift of his tongue has no time to think, and the man who does not think is neither original nor accurate. The man who does not think but talks a great deal must borrow his ideas, and therefore he is likely to be platitudinous. Furthermore the man who talks everlastingly and promiscuously is lacking in reason. This is proverbial. "Every beam of reason and ray of knowledge," says Jeremy Taylor, "checks the dissolution of the tongue." He compares reason and knowledge in their effect to the light of a candle or torch on the surface of a pool: it stops the croaking of the frogs. Now when a man talks from ignorance rather than from knowledge he finds it an inexhaustible fund of volubility. And this certainly appears to be the case with Theodore Roosevelt. He is a perambulating magazine of sound. He goes about emitting the thoughts of others and the inaccuracies of his own. Of his addiction to platitudes there is no reason to complain. They are good platitudes as a rule, and their effect on the common mind is wholesome. But Colonel Roosevelt does a great deal of evil with the untruths which he so profusely and widely disseminates and also with much of the advice which he gravely gives on matters about which he can have no personal knowledge. To men of intelligence this advice does no harm, but not many men have intelligence enough to perceive that the loquacious Colonel assumes a knowledge of things concerning which he can have had nothing but hearsay testimony. The average man merely considers that the Colonel was once elected to a very exalted office, and takes it for granted that he must be a superior man, one with sense enough to refrain from discussing matters about which he has not been fully advised. Average men all over the world were impressed by what the Colonel said about the British government in Egypt. Average men will be impressed by what the Colonel said about the application of the recall to the judiciary in California. Some time ago Senator Owen of Oklahoma, of whom it may be presumed that he is above the average man in intelligence, believed all that Colonel Roosevelt said in a Chicago speech about the recall. The Colonel told an audience in that city that the Massachusetts Constitution contained "precisely that provision for the recall which appears in the proposed Constitution of Arizona." Senator Owen repeated this statement on the floor of the Senate. Yet it is nothing more than a typical Roosevelt falsehood. Senator Owen recently had his attention called by the New York Sun to the fact that he had been deceived by the irresponsible ex-President. The Sun quoted the clauses of the Massachusetts Constitution that deal with the tenure of judicial officers, and showed conclusively that what the ex-President had said was untrue. Henceforth Senator Owen will probably verify before quoting an utterance of the distinguished chatterbox, but will the Colonel take the trouble to repair the mischief that he has done? We have no reason to expect him to do so.

Beale's Essay Contest

Mr. Truxtun Beale signalized his debut as a member of the Board of Regents of the State University by offering a prize of one thousand dollars for the student who writes the best essay on Tolstoi's book "What Is to Be Done." Mr. Beale speaks of this book with something of the enthusiasm of a man who has made a discovery and who is convinced that it is a great discovery. One might infer that Mr. Beale discovered Tolstoi after the great Russian's death. He tells us through the medium of his favorite journal, the Boughten Bulletin, that "What Is to Be Done" is "a stunning book," and that all who read Tolstoi "will be impressed with his genuine and deep sympathy with humanity." He thinks it will be interesting to have the book discussed from an American point of view. With all due deference to Mr. Beale and the faculty and the Board of Regents of the State University we venture to suggest to the students who are contesting for the Beale prize that after reading "What Is to Be Done" they read Chesterton's "What's Wrong With the World." This is not a stunning book, but for readers of Tolstoi it's an excellent antidote, especially for those readers whose sympathy is with Tolstoi the fanatical philosopher rather than with Tolstoi the extraordinary literary genius. The essayists of Berkeley will find it easier to reconcile Chesterton's point of view with their own than to reconcile Tolstoi's point of view with their own. Tolstoi's point of view is that of a Russian, and among Russians there is a lack of social gradation between the nobles and the peasants. So Tolstoi could see nothing in life but pure worldliness and empty show or the antithesis, the primitive aspirations and humble toil of the tillers of the soil. In his young days Tolstoi was a gay sport. He sounded all the depths of worldliness, and then retired to his country place where he led a life of simplicity and frugality. It was about that time, some thirty years ago, that he made a literal interpretation of the teachings of Jesus as expressed in the Sermon on the Mount, and concluded that the simple life was the best. Then he wrote "What to Do," "My Religion" and other works along the same line. If Tolstoi's remedies for what is wrong in the world were practicable the application of them would doubtless effect the realization of Tolstoi's ideals, but it would not follow necessarily that other people's ideals would be realized. This is the point that Chesterton makes. As he says, "Social science is not content with the normal human soul; it has all sorts of fancy souls for sale." In other words each social scientist is intent upon making the world better according to his particular tastes. In all social discussion the quarrel is not merely about the difficulties, but about the aim. The same is true of nearly all the problems of life. We see it illustrated even in so commonplace a matter as the mental attitude of Mr. Beale, which we are able to glimpse through the medium of his press-agent of the Boughten Bulletin who tells us that his prize is intended to "wipe out the moral effect of Warren Porter's exhortation to students to be performers and not reformers and of Frank Anderson's recent address in which he spoke with contempt of the progressive movement and all popular movements." Here we have a clean-cut divergence of view-points, a separate and distinct set of ideals, due entirely to the breeding and rearing of men. Anderson and Porter are captains of industry. They are men of much practical experience in worldly and business affairs. They have risen in the world by their own effort, by the merit which they have vindicated in the struggle for existence, and when they are in business they are in their element. Having made money they have no prejudice against those who wish to make money. Broadly tolerant, instinctively they view with suspicion the intolerant and meddlesome. Mr. Truxtun Beale can have no sympathy with such men. Mr. Beale is a man of wealth by inheritance. Now men who have never made any money, but who have a great deal of money, are usually inclined to hold themselves superior to the hewers of wood and drawers of water. It is these men, these idle rich, who are among the most ardent advocates of the various schemes for the regulation of business. These are the men who, Carlyle tells us, sneer at Mammonism and preach the Gospel of Dilettantism, and the same great philosopher adds: "Mammonism has seized some portion of the Message of Nature to Man; and seizing that, and following it, will seize and appropriate more and more of Nature's message; but Dilettantism has missed it wholly. 'Make money,' that will mean withal 'Do work in order to make money.' But, 'Go gracefully idle in Mayfair,' what does or can that mean? An idle game-preserving and even corn-lawing Aristocracy in such an England as ours: has the world, if we take thought of it, ever seen such a phenomenon till very lately?" It is this difference between Dilettantism and Mammonism that causes the difference in the ideals of such men as Banker Anderson and Landlord Beale. Their view-points are irreconcilable. Each has his own set of remedies for the evils of the world. Beale, for example, would make the nation more virtuous by regulating corporations. The probability is that Anderson believes that conditions might be improved by making it impossible for one man to control one hundred thousand acres of land and enjoy the unearned increment as Beale does in Kern county. Come to think of it, perhaps Banker Anderson's views on economic matters more nearly coincide with Tolstoi's than does Landlord Beale's. For Tolstoi believed in single-tax.

Rooseveltian Fact and Fable

Being a Belated Review of the Book Written by Mrs. Annie Riley Hale to Disillusion the Worshipers of Colonel Roosevelt

By Theodore Bonnet

Most contemporary biographies are of little worth, being chiefly panegyrics, not lives. This is the defect of the biography of Roosevelt written by Jacob Riis, the most enthusiastic of all the admirers of our distinguished former President. But this is not the defect of Mrs. Annie Riley Hale's "Rooseveltian Fact and Fable" as one may infer at the outset from the dedication: "To the Galleries to whom my hero has played so long and so successfully." Mrs. Hale's biography (written, by the way, when Roosevelt was President) is not an inspiring or ennobling study. Unlike its hero it does not teach high living, high thinking or energetic action for the world's good. It deals exclusively with what is most human, most genuine, most characteristic, and the effect on the reader is most unpleasant; so much so that it is a very bad book for persons to read who cherish pleasant illusions. It is of interest principally to those who have studied Mr. Roosevelt in the raw, who are sensible of his imperfections and who may be desirous of knowing the kind of material accessible to the impartial historian of the future who will write of our times. Mrs. Hale disclaims being prejudiced; says her book is intended merely as a contribution to history; but it is evident enough that when she is in doubt she is not inclined to resolve considerations in favor of her hero. However she has gathered an abundance of material from which no question arises.

Mrs. Hale introduces us to Mr. Roosevelt as a member of the New York Assembly of 1883. It was Democratic, and he was the minority leader. Grover Cleveland was Governor. It was at that session that the Civil Service law was passed which Roosevelt's biographers credit him with having supported. One of them says he was the author of the bill. Another one, Jacob Riis, refers to it as the "Roosevelt law" and says it was made the model of the national law. The truth is the national law was enacted five months before the passage of the New York law. And so far from having fathered or promoted the New York law, the record shows that Roosevelt didn't even vote for it. He is recorded as "not voting." In the following year the Republicans returned to power in New York, and attacked and emasculated the Civil Service law. Roosevelt was a prominent member of the Assembly, but failed to defend the law. Even in those days it is said Roosevelt was "wary as a wood-lynx." He was waiting to see whether civil service would become popular. In the following session when there was a strong fight for municipal home rule, a measure was introduced exempting New York from Albany influence—a prolific source of corruption and misrule. Roosevelt suddenly became solicitous about the legal form of the reform measure and in the language of Mrs. Hale "defeated it by springing upon it the time-honored device of legislative crooks of referring it to the Judiciary Committee." It was never heard of any more.

Mrs. Hale follows Rossevelt in the role of job-chaser until the Spanish war, and tells us he made his fight for the New York governorship on his war record. In the winter of 1897-98 just prior to the war he made the acquaintance of Leonard Wood, an army surgeon, who was immediately engaged as military coach for the future commander of the Rough Riders. Quickly Mrs. Hale takes us to San Juan Hill and quotes for us the glowing description of the charge from which Roosevelt derived his military fame. It was written by a New York Sun correspondent, who pictured the Colonel on horseback, waving his sword, leading his men while the mausers of the enemy crackled continuously. The Sun man attributed to Roosevelt all the heroism of the day and the capture of the block-house on the hill. Says Mrs. Hale:

"It really seems nothing short of sacrilege to mar this heroic picture in any of its inspiring details. Yet the clear, cold light of history, unmindful of the pangs of the hero-worshippers, has been steadily turned on this glowing battle scene, with the cruel result (to the worshippers) of completely eliminating the central figure—horse and all!

"The first to turn on the disillusioning stream was Senator Alger in his 'Spanish-American War,' published in 1901.

"On page 164 of Alger's History, we read: 'A part of the cavalry division which first attacked Kettle Hill, did not advance on San Juan Ridge at the time of the assault by Kent's infantry division. The 1st Volunteer Cavalry, under Colonel Roosevelt, as well as parts of the Regular regiments which captured Kettle Hill, did not join the infantry in its charge on San Juan block-house and that portion of San Juan Ridge to the left of Santiago Road, commonly known as San Juan Hill'

"The 'Kettle Hill' here referred to, was a low, steep knoll, surmounted by a farm house and some huge iron caldrons—whence its name—to the right of San Juan Ridge whereon were the main Spanish entrenchments, and separated from them by an open, grass-covered glade, a third of a mile wide. 'Kettle Hill' therefore presented the first obstacle to the American advance, and was held by a skirmish line of Spaniards, who quickly gave way before the attacking force, consisting (according to Alger, p. 157) of 'one squadron of the 1st Volunteer Cavalry (under Colonel Roosevelt), who all charged together over the crest.'

"And here, according to the best authorities, the gallant Rough Riders rested on their laurels. Having easily dislodged the Spaniards from this unimportant and slightly defended hillock, they calmly watched their comrades, the infantry led by Hawkins and Kent, storm and capture the main Spanish position on top of San Juan Hill.

"Historian Alger—who was Secretary-of-War Alger when this history was in the making—very cleverly makes Historian Roosevelt corroborate his account of the disposition of the troops in this battle, by citing an isolated paragraph from the 'Rough Riders,' pp. 134-136: 'No sooner were we on the crest of Kettle Hill than the Spaniards from their line in our front, where they were strongly entrenched, opened fire upon us with their rifles and two pieces of artillery. . . On the top of the hill was a huge iron kettle, probably used for sugar refining. Several of our men took shelter behind this. We had a splendid view of the charge on San Juan block-house to our left and a third of a mile to the front, where the Infantry of Kent, led by Hawkins, were climbing the Hill.' . . .

"The average reader will wonder how he missed this tell-tale paragraph in Colonel Roosevelt's book, which somehow or other conveys such an impression of Rough Rider valor and omnipresent activity, that one forgets all other participants in the war, and agrees with Mr. Dooley that the book should have been named 'Alone in Cuba.' Surely Historian Alger has made a mistake. We turn to the indicated page incredulously. No, there it is as quoted, securely sandwiched between Rough Rider acts fore and aft in the rapidly moving picture—paeans to right of it, paeans to left of it. Yet obscured as it is by the more important business (in the mind of the auothor) of glorifying the Rough Riders, and completely lost as it has been in all the shouting evoked by the publication of the myth; here is the statement in plain black and white from their gallant commander himself, that, instead of leading the charge on the San Juan block-house, the dashing troopers (including their commander) viewed it from behind the sugar kettle a third of a mile away!"

Furthermore according to Mrs. Hale all the military authorities now agree that San Juan was an infantry charge. And she remarks how curious it is that when the 5th Army Corps was mustered out Theodore Roosevelt, commander of 500 men in an army of 16,000, looked bigger than every living soldier in the Republic. She intimates that it was because of Roosevelt's instinct for publicity. She next tells of the painting that represents Roosevelt leading the San Juan charge:

"In 1902, Mr. Roosevelt being President, Vereschagin, the famous Russian painter of war scenes, came to Washington, and taking up his abode at Fort Meyer, began his now celebrated painting of the San Juan Hill Charge. By whose order, or upon whose initiative, this was done, no one now living in Washington appears to have any knowledge. There are residents who 'remember that an effort was made to induce the Government to buy the picture,, but by whom this effort was made no one will undertake to affirm. Certain old newspaper correspondents of Washington remember vaguely seeing the painting 'while it was on exhibition at the White House,' but the White House ushers are all afflicted with confusing recollections. 'It may have been there, or it may not,' is the baffling reply to all queries. Inquiry of Wm. Loeb, Jr., as to 'when this picture was at the White House?' elicited the illuminating response, that he 'has no idea where the picture is now, nor whether any copies of it are extant in Washington.' Diligent search in various quarters has failed to discover any 'copies' of the painting in Washington.

"From a Fort Meyer employee, the writer learned that the picture was sent to New York, after Vereschagin's death in 1904, and sold for $10,000. This Ft. Meyer employee, who was on the spot when the painting was being executed, further vouchsafed the information, that the work was done mostly 'under cover,' the artist not inviting public inspection; that he (the Ft. Meyer attache) had seen it only once, and was struck with the equestrian figure of the President in the center; that the President came several times to Fort Meyer during the progress of the painting and was in consultation with the artist."

Next comes the story of the "Round Robin" which Roosevelt's biographers attribute to him. According to Mrs. Hale who quotes many military authorities it was the biggest blunder of the war. That it did not result in a renewal of hostilities, acquainting the enemy as it did of the weakness of our troops, was a great piece of luck. Mrs. Hale cites many circumstances in Patient reader, are you familiar with the jargon of the suffrage movement? You're sick and tired of it? That's beside the question. I asked if you knew the terminology of The Cause and I asked for the purpose of ascertaining whether you are posted on the difference between a suffragist and a suffragette. Didn't know there was any difference? Thought they meant one and the same thing? Then are you languishing in the outer darkness and it is my duty to enlighten you.

Let me summon a pretty woman to do the enlightening. She is tall and well poised, tailored modishly and daintily, her black hair bonneted in accord with the becoming fashion of the moment. She has black eyes that snap with intelligence and sparkle with humor and her face is modelled on soft lines that melt easily and often into smiles.

"A suffragist," she explains, "is one who is willing to let evolution bring to women the reforms to which they think themselves entitled. A suffragette believes in hastening those reforms by aggressive methods."

A pretty distinction, is it not? And doubly pretty when made by a pretty woman who puts her convictions into the tones of her soft voice. Listening to her, one understands immediately that she is a suffragette. And Mrs. Lillian Harris Coffin is certainly a suffragette, an aggressive suffragette.

"Our aggression is amiable aggression," she smilingly explains. Which, being interpreted, probably means that the victim—shall we call him a victim?—is buttonholed figuratively, not actually; that he is hit with an argument and a smile at one and the same time; that his fretful quills are smoothed by feminine fascinations while his ears are filled with feminine entreaties; in a word, that he is won to The Cause as men have been won to women's causes through the centuries, a look lambasting his logic and a dimple demolishing his doubts.

Of course Mrs. Coffin does not own up to such methods. She may even imagine that she does not use them. But she is a clever woman and she goes as far as to say:

"I am an opportunist. I am willing to grasp at anything that will help The Cause."

"And I am an optimist," she adds. "I have found that men would rather do right than wrong. You have to buy men to do the wrong things; but the ordinary man will do the right things for nothing. He rather enjoys the feel of it."

Mrs. Coffin ought to know. She has been engaged in the amiable aggressions of the suffrage propaganda for seven or eight years and in that time she has met many sorts and conditions of men. She has been an active worker at political conventions and at sessions of the Legislature; she has helped in campaigns; she has lobbied and she has lectured. And through it all optimism survived, probably because opportunism was its accompanist.

"I never in my life tried to convert a man to woman's suffrage," she assured me. She did not smile when she said it. She was very serious.

"Mr. Coffin—" I began uncertainly.

"Mr. Coffin believes in it," she interrupted. "But he has never been in politics. He has voted the straight Republican ticket all his life."

The juxtaposition of the last two statements gave me pause. I would have liked to dwell on them. But the serenity of Mr. Coffin's voting habits was, after all, alien to the subject. The suggestion that suffrage propagandism should begin at home seemed more germane and I insinuated as much, somewhat hesitatingly however. Mrs. Coffin took it in good part. She is a very good natured woman.

"There is no reason why a man should be an active suffrage worker just because his wife is a suffragette," she argued. "Lots of men are with us whose wives are not suffragettes or suffragists. Man and wife cannot be expected to agree. What interest would there be in life if they did? There would be no individuality. They would stagnate."

Which seemed to settle more than one matter. But it unsettled my ideas as to the depth of Mr. Coffin's suffragistic convictions. If there are masculine equivalents for the term "suffragist" and "suffragette," in which category does he belong? Is he content that evolution should do the work? Or does he believe in aggression? I give it up.

MRS. LILLIAN HARRIS COFFIN.

Domestically and publicly, I should say, Mrs. Coffin's has been a well filled life. She was born in Evanston, Illinois.

In what year?

At the question, not put quite so baldly as that, the suffragette is submerged in the eternal feminine. She does not include in her bill of rights the equal right with man to reveal her age. In fact she expressly reserves the right to withhold it.

I did not learn in what year Mrs. Coffin was born.

But it couldn't have been so very long ago.

"My father was a theorist," she told me.

Did he include woman's suffrage among his pet theories?

"No, he was not then a believer in The Cause."

Suffrage therefore was not hereditary with Mrs. Coffin.

In accordance with her father's theories she was educated at home, devoting a great deal of time to music. For eight years she studied with Professor William Tomlins of Chicago who trained our charming Miss Estelle Carpenter. Mrs. Coffin was ambitious to be an opera singer. She actually did some concert work, but she lost her soprano voice and turned to kindergarten work. She studied at the first kindergarten training school in Chicago and when she came to California she taught at the first kindergarten established in Oakland. So she is really a pioneer in the work.

It was the California Club which led her into active suffrage work. The California Club was founded by suffragists and suffragettes. Mrs. Coffin was a suffragist when she joined it. She was eager for public service, but she found that her efforts were generally ineffectual. Her work among the women at the county hospital and the jails was thwarted by official red tape or stupidity or dishonesty, I am not clear which. But when she discovered that her work was ineffective, she decided that women needed the ballot if they were ever to accomplish constructive work. So she became a suffragette, an amiably aggressive suffragette. And she has been suffragetting in an amiably aggressive way ever since.

"Sometimes I work at it for eighteen hours a day," she says.

But she has had time for other activities. There is, as previously indicated, a Mr. Coffin. There is also a Miss Coffin who is at the University of the Pacific and who, her mother hopes, will some day be a great artist. Miss Coffin is a suffragette, no doubt by a combination of heredity and conviction.

Mrs. Coffin has found time for business too. She is a member of an undertaking firm in Oakland and she says the firm is making money. Without stopping to make any of the obvious jokes which might be cracked about a Mrs. Coffin engaging in the undertaking business, I shall merely remark that this undertaking undertaking seems to prove that women have a capacity for business. It is run by women, among them being Mrs. "Admiral" McCalla, Mrs. Arthur W. Cornwall, Mrs. H. H. Norwood, Mrs. Lucia Thomson Neeland, Miss Katherine Ball, Miss Ella Hubbard and Mrs. Emma Shertzer.

"There are others," says Mrs. Coffin, "but I would not dare to give you their names."

Mrs. Coffin has had to sacrifice her social life to her suffrage activity.

"It has been a real sacrifice," she admits, "but it has been worth while."

And the time is coming when further sacrifice will be unnecessary. As I said, Mrs. Coffin is an optimist. She is quite confident that woman's suffrage will carry at the next election.

"In six months my work will be done," she says without a smile. "Then I will devote myself to literary work. I once wrote a story and I am anxious to write again. I have lots of material."

Considering her many experiences with politicians and legislators she should have lots of material. For the sake of her literary career and not out of any sympathy for The Cause, I shall be sorry if another six months does not work her release from suffrage work. But my good wishes are tainted with dubiety.

The Coming Expositions

San Francisco is not the only city which is preparing for a World's Fair. Two international expositions will be opened in Italy next month; an art and historical exposition at Rome and an industrial exposition at Turin. It is proposed to hold a world's fair in New York in 1913 to celebrate the three-hundreth anniversary of the founding of the city. There will be a world's fair at Winnipeg in 1914; and a Spanish-American exposition at Seville in the same year. The Japanese will hold a national exposition at Tokio in 1917. There is also talk of an international exposition in Paris in 1920. The United States Agricultural and Industrial Exposition will be held in 1912 at a place not yet determined. The one hundredth anniversary of Commodore Perry's victory will be celebrated at Put-in-Bay Island in 1913. The centennial of the Treaty of Ghent will be celebrated in 1914. Then there is the San Diego Fair. It is quite evident that the world will not want for expositions during the next decade.

The Dutch Treat and the Cash Register

An anti-treating ordinance has been put in force in Tacoma. Its moral effect will be uncertain, according to the Town Crier of Seattle which comments thus:

Over in Tacoma the Dutch treat has been established by law. In the City of Destiny it is no longer permissible for friends or acquaintances to promote that sort of goodfellowship which comes with the purchase of a few rounds. Eat and Tacoma eats with you, but if you drink, you must drink alone. It is now in violation of the statutes in such case made and provided to entertain at the bar. Evidently the hope is that by isolating the bacillus of booze-buying processes of decay will be set up leading to final extermination. What the effect of the new order will be upon the habitual patron of the saloon remains to be seen. If he complies with the law he will discover that two drinks for himself will cost 30 cents, whereas, heretofore, an investment of a quarter, in company of a friend, gave him one drink for a starter and almost certain assurance of reciprocity—a net price of 12½ cents per drink. Unless the drinking habit, as well as the treating habit, goes into decline, the law will work to the immediate advantage of the saloon. For this reason it is not quite clear that the anti-treating regulation is a blow at the Demon Rum.

Rooseveltian Misstatement

The Spectator of Oregon has been calling attention to some inaccuracies in Theodore Roosevelt's eulogy of Francis J. Heney which was delivered in Los Angeles and widely disseminated by the Associated Press. Mr. Roosevelt said, "When, in the Oregon land case it became necessary to obtain a man of great ability and indomitable courage, I went to Francis J. Heney. As a result of that effort we got one United States Senator in stripes; we got one Congressman in stripes, also." The Spectator says: "You see, Colonel Roosevelt will not or cannot tell the truth. Colonel Roosevelt, who at the time of which he speaks, was President, not only sent Francis J. Heney to Portland to prosecute, but he also sent a judge to try, some men charged with offenses against the government. . . . But the specially chosen prosecutor and the specially picked judge did not put stripes on a United States Senator and a Congressman from Oregon. Mitchell and Williamson were convicted, and Mitchell died before his appeal could be heard. . . . And no lawyer in the State of Oregon who can read testimony with his understanding instead of his prejudice can be found who will not say that John H. Mitchell would have been granted a new trial. Ex-Congressman Williamson is not in stripes, and, at least for the crimes charged against him by the special prosecution, never will be in stripes. The Supreme Court granted him a new trial because of flagrant errors committed by the special prosecution and neither Roosevelt nor any other bitter, vindictive party to the prosecution has any right to say that Williamson is in stripes until a fair prosecution, an unprejudiced judge and an honest jury has put the stripes on him."

The truth is of course that the prosecutions in Oregon were conducted by methods precisely the same as those practiced by Mr. Heney in this city.

The New French Ministry

France is not overly impressed by the make-up of the ministry which has been selected to succeed the Briand regime. The new premier, Monis, has a rather colorless political career. The bulk of the new cabinet was drawn from the Radical-Socialist minority which worked the downfall of Briand when the responsibilities of office made him a conservative, which is the way the responsibilities of office usually affect big men of radical leanings. Delcasse who returns to the cabinet as Minister of Marine, overshadows his colleagues. Germany is troubled by his reappearance, for it has not yet forgotten the Algeciras imbroglio when Delcasse's masterly leadership placed the Fatherland in a position of virtual isolation in Europe. England on the other hand is frankly pleased, for it was Delcasse who overturned the Bismarckian tradition that Germany could always safely reckon on the unalterable antagonism of British and French interests. The British-French entente which he brought about has lasted ever since. During his retirement he devoted himself, as a member of the French Parliamentary Naval Commission, to the revivification of the French navy and he will now be in a position to bring it to the strength of the navy of Germany. It is expected that the new radical ministry will have to moderate its tone to meet popular opinion and carry out the unfinished program of Briand.

Correspondence

An Anti-Suffrage Protest

Editor of Town Talk, Dear Sir: In common with many others of my sex I am getting very tired of this interminable suffrage agitation. I have to listen to suffrage talk wherever I go. It is dinned at me whenever I visit my club, at luncheons, teas, receptions, even in my own home when I ask a few friends to drop in for an afternoon. There is more and more of it in the papers all the time. Those of us who have no sympathy for woman's suffrage hate to argue the question with our militant sisters, so we are compelled to suffer in silence. But I am beginning to rebel. Is my life—or that part of it which I spend with members of my own sex—to be made miserable because a lot of foolish women imagine they want to vote? Have I no escape from the epidemic of suffragistic argument? I have just returned to my home, cross, tired and nervous, after listening for two hours to a lot of chattering suffragists who cornered me at the club and would not let me go. I refused to argue with them, knowing that if I did the two hours would have stretched their weary length to four and my husband's and children's dinner would not have been properly prepared. As it is I am not in the proper mood to welcome my husband home after his day of toil—he does toil—and have too much sense, thank Heaven, to bore him with the reason for my crankiness. I am writing this letter just to give my feelings vent. I have to get this off my mind somehow. If you know any way in which those of us who are opposed to this suffrage agitation can be protected from the militant women who do believe in it, please suggest it in one of your admirable editorials. Must I resign from my club? Must I give up all social intercourse with my own sex? If this everlasting suffrage chatter continues I shall do so. But I would prefer some less radical expedient. If you publish this, kindly withhold my name, as I do not care to be talked to death, and just sign it

A Brand Wanted

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Were it not for the evil that will live after them the putative statesmen lately assembled at Sacramento would be deserving of our gratitude for the continuous comic performance they have given during this exceedingly damp and dismal winter. By their works—the Senator and others—they will be commemorated, but would it not be well to tag them nevertheless? How would it be to call them "The Legislature of the Ten Dozen Dunces?" I merely offer this as a suggestion to stimulate the inventive faculty of your readers. How would it be to offer a prize for the best pithy phrase descriptive of these blithering idiots who have been doing the bull-in-the-china-shop act at the State capital? Surely they should not be permitted to return to private life and obscurity without being rubricated. If we cannot lash them out of office at least we can immortalize them with a brand. Yours truly,

—John L. Mason.

In Honor of Roosevelt

The Italian-Swiss Colony's choice TIPO was the only red wine served at the banquet given on Monday night, at the Fairmont Hotel, by the Commonwealth Club in honor of Colonel Theodore Roosevelt.

The Spectator

California for Teddy

If some of the Progressives hereabouts who are on intimate terms with Colonel Theodore Roosevelt know what they are talking about that gentleman has already decided on becoming a candidate for the Presidency in 1912. Furthermore so far as California is concerned the La Follette boom has petered out. From one of the leaders of the Progressive movement in this State I learn that "Battle Bob" is no longer in the running, and that the Colonel is regarded as the logical Progressive candidate. That this sentiment is not confined to California I learn from a prominent Federal official who is in close touch with affairs at Washington. He informs me that President Taft's intimate friends realize that Roosevelt is the man they have to beat for the nomination. He also says that the leaders of the Republican party are growing lukewarm toward the President because of his disposition to conciliate the insurgents, and that some of them are of the opinion that to save the party they will have to get behind the man who divided it for his own benefit.

Trivialities Make History

Political events appear to be shaping themselves according to prophecy. It will be remembered that when Roosevelt as President was employing all the machinery of the Federal government to nominate Taft as his successor it was said that it was his design to pave the way for his return to power in four years. And now it appears that the plans attributed to him were less chimerical than they seemed to those observers who have always been pleased to regard Roosevelt as a man without guile, craftless and undesigning. Those other observers who regard him as the most cunning politician of the age can see nothing but craft and strategy in any move that he makes. From one of them I learn that Roosevelt found occasion for being displeased with the President even before leaving for Africa. Many people believe that the coldness between them arose from a question of political policy. The story current among the intimates of both men is that Roosevelt flew into a transport of indignation on receiving a telegram from the President while sitting in his stateroom at the dock in New York just before the departure of his steamer. It was the telegram wishing him bon voyage and containing these words, "I owe more to you and my brother Charles P. Taft than to any other men in the world." The giving credit to brother Charles was the thing that riled the inflammable Teddy.

The Agility of Him

Colonel Roosevelt's attitude on the Arizona statehood question, if not deliberately designed, at any rate tends, to embarrass President Taft. It is known that the President regards the proposed application of the recall to the judiciary as revolutionary, contrary to public policy and inconsistent with the republican form of government created by the Founders. It is currently reported that on account of the recall provision he would not sanction the admission of Arizona to the Union. Naturally, therefore, it is embarrassing to him for the former President to insist in unequivocal terms on the right of Arizona under the Constitution to provide for the recall of judges. Of course Mr. Roosevelt may not have intended to embarrass the President, but on this recall question he has exhibited a curious and rather suspicious dexterity, taking several positions almost simultaneously, and in each one maintaining his equilibrium. He is against the principle of the recall because it tends to render the administration of justice precarious; he is for the admission of Arizona despite the recall provision because if the people of Arizona don't wish to recognize justice as the paramount policy of civil society it is their privilege to ignore it and the duty of the rest of the nation to indulge their crazy whim; finally, despite the abstract viciousness of the principle of the recall he is in favor of it in California because here by some mysterious process it becomes a virtue.

Hiram Launches His Boom

The launching of the Roosevelt Presidential boom was the big event of the evening at the Coliseum meeting presided over by Governor Johnson. That meeting was arranged for the mutual benefit of the Colonel and the Johnson-Spreckels political machine, and from the standpoint of all concerned it was a brilliant success. Governor Johnson extolled the Colonel and expressed the hope that he would again be the national leader; and the Colonel extolled the Governor and praised the Legislature that ate out of the Governor's hands. The mutual admiration of the occasion was beautiful to behold. To please the Spreckels band the Colonel revived recollections of the Graft Prosecution,, paying the tribute of his approval to his California touts and indicating how much he knew about the history of local events by quoting from the report of the Committee that was appointed by Mayor Taylor at the behest of his masters to give them a coat of whitewash. On the afternoon of the same day on which this illustrious idol of the masses talked with characteristic glibness of matters about which he is not informed he delivered a lecture at Berkeley on the subject of newspapers and magazines that poison the public mind.

Lawlor the Cynosure

The guests at the Commonwealth Club dinner at the Fairmont were keyed to a high pitch of excitement when seven o'clock came, for Colonel Roosevelt was expected to appear on the stroke of seven. When the great hour arrived there was a stir outside the banquet room and the expectant crowd arose as one to honor their guest. But instead of Colonel Roosevelt there came a messenger announcing that the Colonel was delayed and would not arrive for fifteen minutes. So the hungry enthusiasts sank into their chairs again. As they did so they all looked rather sadly toward the vacant seat of honor. A familiar sight caught all eyes.Among the dignitaries at the head of the banquet board was Judge Lawlor and as he resumed his seat he surreptitiously helped himself to an olive.

At the Golden Banquet Too

Judge Lawlor has a way of distinguishing himself at Roosevelt banquets. When the Colonel was here before, during his second term in the Presidency, he was honored with a "golden banquet" at the Palace. On that occasion also he was late in arriving at the festive spread. There was then the same high-keyed expectancy and when the sounds of approaching greatness were heard, the banqueters arose to greet Roosevelt and greeted instead—Judge Lawlor who was late himself. On that occasion, it will be remembered, Roosevelt apologized for his lateness by explaining that it was his daily practice while away from home to write a letter to his wife and that he had been detained in the performance of that domestic duty. Everybody thought that Teddy was a very devoted husband, which was probably what he wanted them to think. Otherwise why did he make the explanation?

his present tour. I refer to young Kirk Simpson, the brother of Ernest S. Simpson, the managing editor of the Call. Kirk Simpson has been a conspicuously successful reporter for the Associated Press and he was some time ago promoted from the local to the New York office. He was in line for a European berth, but his superiors changed their minds when San Francisco got the World's Fair. They sent him with Roosevelt when the Colonel started on his jaunt and the world of newspaper readers are depending on Simpson for the daily record of Teddy's achievements. He travels in Roosevelt's private car and has enjoyed every mile of the journey. Simpson will be in San Francisco for the Associated Press during the Fair.

"Charley's perfectly wild over his new motor car," remarked a man to a friend.

"Wild over it!" responded the latter. "You should see and hear him when he's under it."

"Tom" Williams

In every eulogy of "Tom" Williams that has been printed the statement appears that he was "loyal to his friends." "Tom" Williams was more than loyal to his friends. Loyalty to friendship is not such a noble trait as some people seem to believe. One may be loyal to his friends merely by not being disloyal to his friends. Now to abstain from disloyalty to friends is not the sign of superior excellence of character. "Tom" Williams was a man capable of self-sacrifice for a friend, a man in whom his friends could confide and whose opinion could be valued for its justness and its sincerity. When the news of "Tom" Williams' death was received in San Francisco a reporter bowed his head on his desk and wept. That reporter had had experience of "Tom" Williams' friendship, and his tribute to it was more eloquent than any eulogy that I ever heard or read. It was very easy for a man of "Tom" Williams' nature to be loyal to his friends; how easy, we may judge from his generosity to his enemies, and from performances actuated by sympathy with his fellow men. Williams went about at no little expense of time and trouble doing good for men who were not his friends, for men with whom he was not acquainted. A notable instance of this innate kindness was afforded in the case of William Buckley who was convicted of a murder which occurred in this city during the stablemen's strike. It was discovered that he was innocent, and it was "Tom" Williams that started the agitation for his pardon and that invoked every available influence to save the guiltless man's life. Among those whose influence he invoked was Judge Lawlor, the man who presided at Buckley's trial. Judge Lawlor, though he admitted that there was grave doubt of Buckley's guilt and professed to be willing to help save him, acted nevertheless with what Williams regarded as dissimulation, and years afterwards when the two met one day at the Family Club, (Lawlor as a member and Williams as a guest) Williams refused to take the judge's proffered hand. Williams was criticised for this act of discourtesy. There were sticklers for club etiquette who declared that he did wrong, but Williams was no slave to the conventional niceties of polite conduct. He had the courage of his moral convictions and despite all his innate generosity of character he would not dissemble his feelings even in what is regarded as so small a matter as to give outward manifestation of a respect that the heart does not feel.

A Tom Williams Story

There is a great deal of sorrow around town over the death of this lovable journalist. He had many friends here, most of whom looked forward eagerly to the day when he would return to The Examiner, the paper of his first love. A lot of anecdotes are being narrated of him. One of them has to do with those early days in his San Francisco career when he drove a Fourth street horse car. Williams was tooling his two horses over the cobbles one drowsy afternoon when a butcher's wagon got on the track. "Get that old cow of yours off the track or I'll run over you," cried Williams to the driver. The driver answered with a similar taunt, one word led to another and finally a race was decided on. Williams wrapped the reins around the handle of the brake, jumped off the platform and began pelting his two animals with rocks to make them travel. He won the race, but when the horses came to a curve they swerved so suddenly that the traces broke and the car hurtled on in a straight line, coming to a stop in the show window of a second-hand clothes dealer. Whereupon Williams handed his resignation to the conductor of the car and quit the street railway business.

Duelling in New York

Francis Wilson told some friends the other evening an interesting story in connection with his play "The Bachelor's Baby." It was first written, not as play but as a story, and was submitted to Scribner's for publication. The story as a whole met with the approval of the readers for Scribner's, but one incident was criticised. In the controversy over the baby the Bachelor insulted Colonel Calvert in a fashion which called for bloodshed and the Southern gentleman called out the New Yorker. Wilson represented the duel as taking place in a Sixth Avenue fencing school. It was pointed out to him that Scribner's could not publish a story containing an incident so palpably absurd. "Everybody knows," he was told, "that duels are not fought in New York nowadays." "But duels are fought in New York," was Wilson's answer. "I myself have seen many duels in which blood was shed at the Sixth Avenue fencing school. Cubans and Spaniards fight duels there quite frequently."

One on the Examiner

By the way, Francis Wilson "put one over" on the Examiner dramatic critic. When the Examiner critic went to interview Wilson in his dressing room he found the comedian giving "Baby" Davis a lesson. "What particular subject are we at work on just now, Stevey?" asked Wilson. "We are studying," answered the tyke, "the science of etymology, which is that special branch of philological science dealing with the origin and history of words, tracing their primitive significance and the changes that have taken place in their form and meaning." "Wow!" comments the critic, indicating his surprise. Then Stevey went on to dissect Latin and Greek roots. The critic says he "etymologized like a savant." The critic was amazed. He had never heard anything like it. Of course he hadn't. He wasn't "on to" Wilson's tricks. The fact is that that lesson in etymology is a joke which Francis Wilson, with the able cooperation of "Baby" Davis, springs whenever he gets a chance. It is said that "Baby" Davis, who is something of a humorist despite his tender age, enjoys the amazement of his auditors almost as much as Francis Wilson does.

Circular on Request

When the show is over and the visitor departs, Wilson gives the youngster his real lessons which are better suited to his eight years.

"Do you think the boy will say what he sees put in the sausages?"

"No, he's only too thankful he isn't put into them himself."

Such a Rebuke!

Attorneys who address the Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District if they be not careful to avoid the use of language that might wound the feelings of the learned judges will incur the danger of most severe rebuke. This I learn from an opinion written by Judge Hart the other day in the case of Daly against Wedemeyer. Tom Geary and F. A. Meyers were the attorneys for the respondents. In their petition for a rehearing they said: "Consciously or unconsciously, by the decision of this court, rendered in the above entitled cause, the rules established by the Supreme Court seem to be reversed and set aside and a new rule not supported by any authority except this opinion declared in place thereof." To show to what degree the court had wandered from the rule they cited several authorities. Now it is clear enough that the attorneys intimated the possibility of the court's deliberately violating an established rule. Judge Hart made the punishment fit the crime. He administered an awful rebuke. He swatted them hip and thigh in this deadly sarcastic fashion: "An examination of the foregoing cases will show that either 'consciously or unconsciously,' counsel have permitted themselves to be led into what appears to us to be an inexcusable misapprehension of the nature of the question presented by a motion for a nonsuit, for, obviously, the cases cited have no more application to the question decided in this case than the code of Hammurabi would have to the solution of the much mooted question whether Peary or Cook was the first to discover the long lost North Pole." This appears to be a case of "You're another," and then some.

When Ballard Wrecked the Mine

I saw John Ballard on the street a few days ago and the sight of him revived many old memories. He is just as big and husky as of yore, but not so prosperous-looking. Fortune has not been as kind to him as it has been to his former associates in the mining business, W. H. Martin and Captain Nevills. It will be remembered by old-timers that Ballard and Martin built the Powell street cable road and afterwards embarked in the mining business with Nevills. Martin is a physical wreck now while Nevills and Ballard are still full of vitality. Of the three only Ballard has been flouted by the goddess of luck. The three men used to fight bitterly among themselves and one story of their triangular contest has never been told, so far as I know, although the papers were full of their doings. Ballard used to say that the reason he always kept his hands in his pockets (which was a characteristic of his) was that he was afraid that if he took them out he would assault Nevills. At the height of the trouble between the three men Ballard went up to Tuolumne county to the Rawhide Mine, which they owned, intent on revenging himself on Martin and Nevills. The mine had ceased paying dividends. "I'll blow the old hole out of the ground," Ballard declared. So he ordered all the workmen from the mine and set a charge of dynamite. When the charge exploded it blew a tremendous hole in the mine, but instead of destroying Rawhide, it uncovered the richest ore in its history. With the money they took out as a result of Ballard's action the three men were able to buy the great App mine.

The Office and the Man

C. C. Goodwin of Salt Lake has been reminiscing in his weekly about early Californians. He tells several stories about Congresmans Edward C. Marshall who was a candidate for the United States Senate in 1854. Throughout the campaign Marshall had insisted that the scramble for office was disgraceful and that the office should seek the man. But when the Legislature met, Marshall was in full evidence on the streets of Sacramento. A friend approached him and said, "Mr. Marshall, I thought it was your theory that the office should seek the man." "Certainly it is," Marshall replied, "but suppose the office is out looking for him, is it anything more than common courtesy for him to be where he can be found?"

A Tribute to Governor Bigler

When John Bigler was a candidate for governor, Marshall went up and down the State, debating the issues of the campaign with him. Bigler was short and very corpulent. After a tour of the mountain camps Bigler and Marshall held a debate in Marysville and Marshall paid Bigler this compliment: "You would not think it, but my friend Bigler is the toughest formation that ever an opponent tried to debate solemn political issues with. I never realized his charm until one morning in a mining camp I arose at dawn and started out for a walk. I found the governor out ahead of me. He was going from store to store. In every place he was first struck by the wonderful quality of goods the merchant exposed for sale. He had seen nothing of their quality in any of the stores of the lower cities. Then, the eulogy over, he was most glad to find such goods because he wanted to purchase a pair of trousers. He knew there was not a pair of pantaloons in all the mountains of California that would come within sixteen inches of going around him."

Jere Burke and the Chaplain

Up in Sacramento they told a good story about Jere Burke a few days ago. It had to do with the Legislature of 1897 when Rev. Charles L. Miel was chaplain of the Senate. Dr. Miel was noted for the brevity of his prayers which consisted every morning of the Our Father and a few extempore words, the entire invocation lasting from twenty-two to twenty-five seconds. One morning Jere Burke, who had been a schoolmate of Dr. Miel, met the chaplain in the lobby and with profuse apologies for the liberty he was taking, explained that some of the legislators thought the invocation was a little too brief. He suggested that the extempore portion be lengthened a little and assured the chaplain that if this was done, everybody would be satisfied. The chaplain accepted the suggestion in good part and promised to pray for a few seconds longer thereafter. "Begin this morning," advised Burke and again Dr. Miel acquiesced. It had been noted throughout the session that Senators Denison and Voorhies, who sat together, seemed very devout during the prayers. They inclined their heads very low and invariably, when the amen was spoken, one handed the other a cigar. A curious newspaperman investigated and found that the senators had stop watches and bet a cigar every morning on the length of the prayer. On the morning that Jere Burke spoke to the chaplain, Denison raised his head at the amen and it was noticed that his face was very pale. He had been winning cigars steadily from Voorhies, but this morning the prayer had lasted thirty-five seconds and Denison lost to Voorhies, not a cigar but a case of champagne, for they had decided to plunge. Senator Voorhies and Jere Burke enjoyed that wine, but Denison never bet again.

"Regulating" Slot Machines

It did not take the Senate long to pass the anti-slot machine bill after Senator Bell of Pasadena had read a few extracts from circulars issued to cigar men by the manufacturers of the gambling devices. "By touching the plug you can increase your earnings by fifty per cent," said one circular. "Push the lever two notches to the right and earn money fast," advised another. "With our machine full houses will never worry you. It's a winner, all polished up; and a sure bait for the sucker." From still another Bell read: "That last royal flush hurt, didn't it? They come so seldom you will be glad to see them on our big winning slot machine. It's a hummer and the tightest in the game. Just twist the plug, that's all." "No wonder I paid $5 and then had to buy my cigar," wailed Cutten of Eureka. "Who wants to be a senator when he can run a slot machine," mused Wright of San Diego. The machines were banned unanimously.

A Mart for Rare Books

It seems that San Francisco is becoming a good market for rare books, pamphlets, manuscripts and incunabula. Recently we had in our midst Bibliopole Brooks of Indianapolis; now we have with us Bibliopole Marlow of London. Mr. Marlow represents the great book house of Birdsall and Son of Northampton, a book house which has been under its present management for one hundred and twenty years. This is his first professional visit to the Pacific Coast and he brings with him some fifty thousand dollars' worth of books which are now on exhibition at Paul Elder's book shop. There are rarely beautiful bindings in the collection, bindings of the sort for which Birdsall and Son are famous; but the bibliophile turns naturally to the first editions and manuscripts which are the tidbits of Mr. Marlow's collection. Among other interesting items he has the manuscript of De Quincey's essay of Pope, written in a fine and regular hand, decidedly not the hand of an opium-wrecked man. There is a manuscript of Dumas pere which indicates that he drove a clerkly pen; an interesting letter of Shelley's; and a manuscript of George Meredith. There is an old-fashioned album with an acrostic to Emma Button in the delicate chirography of Charles Lamb. There is a poem by Byron, in the author's handwriting, which has never been in his published works. There is a copy of Izaak Walton's Lives of Donne, Wotton, Hooker and Herbert which derives immense value from the fact that it is a presentation copy from the old angler to his sister. He signed himself "Iz. Wa." There is the first edition of the Ingoldsby Legends which Barham presented to George Cruikshank and which the artist autographed. There is a copy of Mrs. Browning's "Greek Christian Poets," with an autographic presentation from Robert Browning to Lord Leighton. There is a first edition of Pickwick in "the green leaves;" a first edition of "Queen Mab;" a first edition of "Endymion:" of "The Poems by Two Brothers," a rare Tennysonian item; a first edition of Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy and many other things well worth the inspection of a booklover.

Major Andre's Watch

Some time ago Mr. Marlow chanced upon some letters written by Major Andre after his arrest and submitted them to William Waldorf Astor. They were very interesting, containing Andre's expressions as to his unhappy condition and his last wishes as to the disposal of his personal effects. His watch was one of the things which he wished to fall into the hands of a friend. Waldorf Astor bought the letters. "I am particularly interested in these letters," he told Marlow, "because it is not very long since I added Major Andre's watch to my collection." Of such are the finds which delight the hearts of collectors.

Mary Austin Theorizes

The production of Mary Austin's "Arrow Maker" at the moribund New Theater has made her an object of interest to the indefatigable New York interviewers. Mary has been talking, talking in rather a queer strain. Listen to her on that difficult subject, inspiration: "Inspiration does not come by chewing a lead pencil. It is the result of a series of suggestions or impressions which gradually work upon the mind." These impressions, according to Mary, may be produced at will. She produces them by looking at and inhaling the fragrance of flowers. "There have been days," she says, "when I would go without lunch so as to be able to buy a bunch of flowers for my writing table." And she needs other stimulants. "I cannot write in a gloomy room shut in by high bleak walls. I must have light, more light! I cannot write well in a shirtwaist. I write with great fluency when I am dressed in something becoming, preferably something yellow." The interviewer noted that she was dressed in a charming yellow

IT would not be possible within the limit of this announcement to do more than make a short summary of the remarkable exhibition of books now on view at our Store. The collection deals with all schools of literature and includes Poetry, Belle Lettres, Sport, Travel, Incunabula, Rare Missals, Authors' Presentation Volumes, MSS, Rare Letters, Original Drawings by Cruikshank, Burne-Jones, etc., etc. We can confidently say that a more remarkable and Catholic Collection has never before been on sale in San Francisco. Many of the volumes have come from great Historic Libraries and are known in the Auction Marts of Europe. There is also a very fine Exhibition of Modern Bindings principally from the Bindery of Birdsall, Northampton, the oldest established Bindery in England.

It is to be hoped that Booklovers and Collectors will avail themselves of the opportunity of inspecting this wonderful display.

The Exhibition will continue only until April 22d.

organdie gown. Music also inspires Mary. "The moment I was able to go to the opera in a good seat, dressed like a human being, what was the result?" The interviewer was breathless with attention. "I wrote the libretto of an opera which one of the world's greatest composers is now setting to music." Which, I submit, was a stupendous result for one visit to the opera in a good gown and a good seat.

Mary is Optimistic

"I have come to the conclusion," continued Mary, "that America is teeming with art, literature and music. It is in the soil. I see the traces of it on every side. I don't know whether it will amount to anything yet, or whether it will be crushed in the struggle." This is optimism tempered, or clouded rather, by uncertainty. Mary thinks that a society for the capitalizing of genius should be organized. She doesn't approve of Upton Sinclair's scheme for the endowment of genius in the bud, but thinks that genius in the blossom should be hot-housed, so to speak. In other words, it should be provided with money to buy opera seats and flowers and yellow organdie gowns or whatever else it needs for the stimulation of its literary faculties. Authors whose genius does not need fetichistic stimulation would, of course, not seek assistance from the society. It is all interesting but rather hazy. More direct is Mary's view of the theater. "Why are there so many failures in the dramatic field?" she demanded. The interviewer hadn't the ghost of an idea why. "Because," dogmatized Mary, "theatrical managers are men and because most of our American authors are very young men and do not know women. Managers have not been following the changes which have taken place in American woman during the last few years. Until they reckon with her they will continue to produce plays that fail." The voice is the voice of Mary Austin, but the sentiment is the sentiment of any dweller at Carmel-by-the-Sea.

Captain Slocum of the "Spray"

From a book note published Sunday in the "Call" I learned with real regret of the death of Captain Joshua Slocum whose book, "Sailing Alone Around the World" is one of the most fascinating sea yarns ever spun. It will be recalled that Captain Slocum circumnavigated the globe in a little boat called the "Spray" which he built with his own hands. The story of his cruise was first published serially in the Century, but has since gone into a second edition in book-form. I am a little late in learning of his death, for it seems that he sailed from Vineyard Haven, Mass., toward the end of 1908, bound for the West Indies and has never been heard of since the evening of his first day out when a passing fishing vessel reported the "Spray" making heavy weather. A kindly genial soul was Captain Slocum, beloved by all who knew him. When he was making his celebrated voyage he one day sighted the "Oregon" tearing along the horizon line. It was at the time of the Spanish war and Captain Clark was on the first leg of his celebrated race around the Horn. When the big battleship got within signalling distance Captain Slocum of the tiny "Spray" signalled to Captain Clark: "Let us keep company for mutual protection." Slocum was once describing his first voyage along the South American coast and recounting the perils of those waters to the navigator who is unfamiliar with them. "I suppose you hugged the shore," said one of his hearers. "No," answered Captain Slocum with a twinkle of the eye, "I had my wife with me."

A Variation on an Old Tune

Frankness is usually admirable, though sometimes embarrassing. When a frank statement of the truth replaces one of those white lies sanctioned by usage, embarrassment for somebody is bound to ensue. And yet there may be palliating circumstances. For instance: Just before Miss Marian Newhall left for her tour abroad a prominent young bachelor who has for a long time been an ardent admirer of the charming girl, called to see her. It happens that his attentions have never been appreciated either by Mrs. Newhall or her daughter. On this occasion the maid bore to the expectant caller this message from Miss Newhall: "Tell him that I'm at home but do not care to see him."

The Tale of a Christening Robe

In these jejune days of Lent society is keen for any sort of gossip. So it is chattering about the christening robe. The christening robe, as might be inferred, was used at a christening, the youngst of a prominent matron wearing it. But it was not made for the christening; it was borrowed from another young matron who had occasion to use it for her first born some months ago. The matron who borrowed it neglected to return it when the christening was over, so the owner sent for it. What was her surprise to find that the baby of her friend was out for an airing in the prized christening robe? What was her amazement to learn from an indiscreet maid that the robe had been worn many times since the christening? For her surprise, for her amazement society which is not eloquent, lacks adequate phrases. So they must have been great. As the matron who borrowed the robe has a very wealthy husband, society wonders why she should have borrowed the robe in the first place; and having borrowed it, why she did not return it immediately after the ceremony. This being a jejune season, as I remarked before, a great deal of perfectly useless wonderment is being expended. Which shows how society amuses itself.

Mrs. Darling's Symposium

Whenever the bavardes of the press have nothing else to write about they take up the subject of a salon, and after telling us that it is just the thing we need they speculate as to the person most qualified to play the part of a Maintenon or a Duchesse du Maine. I remember that Mrs. John A. Darling, the most illustrious member of the Hastings clan, has been more than once nominated for the difficult role, and now I wish to concur in all that has been said by those who pronounce her qualified for the distinction. I believe Mrs. Darling is the one woman in San Francisco possessing the tact, the courage and the power to pull off a symposium such as the one that she had at her home one night last week. Of this affair nothing has been said by the bavardes. For Mrs. Darling has no press agent. An unconventional woman is Mrs. Darling; so much so that she doesn't even entertain her friends in the limelight. The friends she entertained last week were among our most distinguished citizens. They were gentlemen who seldom have the pleasure of relaxation in one another's society, and for that if for no other reason the affair was unique. But there is another reason: it was a semi-stag affair; that is, the men possessing wives were separated from their wives for that occasion. No small achievement in itself. The only lady who assisted Mrs. Darling in leavening the masculinity of the occasion was that sprightly dowager Mrs. Eleanor Martin.

Cooper and Dozier in Debate

The men who dined with Mr. and Mrs. Darling were William F. Herrin, Judge J. V. Coffey, Jere Coffey, Judge Cooper, Thomas Dozier, Peter F. Dunne and Louis Hoefler, Judge Thomas F. Graham was invited, I hear, but was unable to attend. Perhaps if he had been present he might have exhibited his talent for reconciling, since on this occasion Judge Cooper and Tom Dozier were given the floor on the Ruef case. This debate was the piece de resistance of the symposium. Judge Cooper was the man that wrote the opinion of the Court of Appeal and Tom Dozier was one of Ruef's attorneys. Dozier is convinced that his client didn't get a square deal. Moreover he is convinced that Judge Cooper wandered away from the record in order to find justification for the decision. Bringing Judge Cooper and Tom Dozier together at a dinner was like associating a lighted match with something combustible soaked in kerosene. The inevitable happened. Tom Dozier was loaded for bear and Judge Cooper was in an open country with no shelter in sight. Mr. Herrin and Mr. Dunne took a deep interest in the discussion, making suggestions here and there that served as prods whenever the controversy lagged. But at no stage of the controversy was there much need of a stimulant. The bars were down, Dozier went at it hammer and tongs fashion, and Judge Cooper was very much on the defensive. It is to be hoped that Mrs. Darling will continue to fan the flame of controversy with the wing of hospitality.

Mrs. Peter's Perennial Youth

Mrs. Peter Martin has a becoming new sunburnt tinge to her hair that is the result, no doubt of her life in the open air. She is wearing a moss green velvet gown with it and if possible is more strikingly handsome than ever in the combination. One of her admiring friends, and there are many of them, tells me that Mrs. Martin is the most tactful young woman in society. She has the social graces inborn, but in her family and family relations there is a great deal to praise. The elder Mrs. Martin is justly attached to her stunning daughter-in-law who relieves her of many responsibilities.

Why She Lingers

From New York comes a characteristic slam at San Francisco and incidentally at the Peter Martins. The story goes that Mr. and Mrs. Peter Martin are making an unusually long stay here because it is cheaper to live here than in New York and Newport. The inference is that the Martins have to economize; in fact the story as I have seen it in an eastern print states that "Peter hasn't so much, anyway." Now it is none of my business whether the Martins have much or little and I don't take any interest in their economies, if they do economize. But I don't like to see San Francisco slighted. The fact is that Mrs. Peter and her interesting hubby linger here because they enjoy this city. They have been having no end of a good time, as they will tell you if you ask them. And good times are not to be had so very cheaply in this neck of the woods.

Sister Theresa

Mrs. Adrian Von Behrens has just returned from a delightful trip abroad. It was she who took Therese Thompson, the sister of Mrs. Charles Norris, to England where the gifted girl became a postulant in the Carmelite Convent in St. Charles Square, London. Miss Thompson will not take her vows till July. At that time the Bishop and Prioress will decide as to her vocation, and also as to whether her health is robust enough to stand the rigorous requirements of the Carmelites. Mother Joseph who is Miss Thompson's superioress, was formerly Lady Minna Howard, sister of the Duke of Norfolk, the first lord of England.

An Imaginative Scribe

Mrs. H. M. A. Miller's luncheon and trolley party which she was to have given last Tuesday in honor of Gertrude Thomas was postponed owing to conflicting dates but this was no deterrent to the bavardes who described the affair in flamboyant language. One pictured the party at the moment of writing, enjoying mid-day repast at the Cliff House where the sound of the sea was accompaniment to their eating. It was an attractive picture the fancy of a conscientious scribe conjured.

Janet Going to Europe

Miss Janet Von Schroeder, who has been visiting Mr. and Mrs. Richard Sprague in New Orleans, has decided not to return to San Francisco, where the Baron and Baroness have been living in the Stetson house since Miss Edith Von Schroeder's horseback accident, but will accompany Mr. and Mrs. Sprague and Isabel to Europe. The Spragues and the Von Schroeders are in a way related by marriage, for the Baroness was a Donahue, and Mrs. Sprague, who was the beautiful Belle Wallace, had a Donahue for her first husband.

The Yarn of Two Shirtwaists

This is another bit of wearing-apparel-gossip. It concerns a charming matron—in society all matrons are charming, as all maids are beautiful—whose pretty country home was burned down some time ago. She lost her entire wardrobe, a truly terrifying loss. Several of her friends were abroad at the time and wrote in a consolatory vein, promising to bring her pretty things to replace those that were gone beyond recall. One lady who was in Paris wrote about two wonderful shirtwaists which she had bought for her. When this traveler returned, the shirtwaists were not forthcoming. They were at the bottom of a trunk which had not been unpacked. They had been sent to the laundry, having been soiled in the long journey home. And so on. Finally those two shirtwaists got on the nerves of the matron for whom they had been bought. They haunted her—or perhaps obsessed is a better word. Instead of forgetting all about them, she told the returned traveler, "I'll not accept them unless you allow me to pay for them." This had the required effect. The shirtwaists were brought forth and sold to her for twenty-five dollars apiece. They are not worth more than five dollars apiece, but the lady considers them a bargain for they were beginning to cost her all the peace of mind she possessed. The two ladies, it may be said in passing, are still friends.

Like Abou Ben Adhem

In looking through the list of important books of 1910 in the World Almanac I was exceedingly interested to find that at the head of the "semi-standard authors" stood Gertrude Atherton with her "Tower of Ivory." To be set down as a "semi-standard author" by the World Almanac is quite an honor, an honor never attained by the mere fiction-mongers. A "semi-standard author," I take it, only becomes a standard author by shuffling off this mortal coil, a process which I piously hope Mrs. Atherton will postpone for many years. I was indeed greatly impressed to find that Mrs. Atherton's name, like that of Abou Ben Adhem, led all the rest, for among the rest were Henry James, Kipling, Hewlett, Selma Lagerlof, H. G. Wells, Sienkiewicz and Anthony Hope. "So the literary authority of the World Almanac considers Mrs. Atherton a greater novelist than any of these!" I exclaimed to myself. And I immediately thought of sending my felicitations to Mrs. Atherton. But on reperusing the list I decided to let the matter drop. The "semi-standard authors" are arranged alphabetically.

On the Links at Del Monte

The links at Del Monte is in superb condition and last week presented a gay appearance. Mr. J. C. Culbertson, a popular clubman of Chicago, came up from Coronado last week for an extended stay, and divides his time between golf and trolling for salmon. Among other golfers who are also expert fishermen are Mr. and Mrs. George R. Frost with their two daughters, and Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Weeks, all of Boston. Dr. R. E. Allardyce, of Stanford, is at Del Monte and is doing splendid work on the links. Mrs. James L. Lowry, James Lowry, Jr., Miss Harriet Lowry, with their friend, Miss Alice Watson, all of Utica, are golfing with enthusiasm and skill and playing tennis. Mr. J. J. Crooks, the expert golfer of San Rafael, was down with a party of friends including Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Wallace, Lydia C. Wallace, H. M. Wallace, Jr., Mrs. P. C. Fuller, Miss Sarah Fuller, all of Racine, and Miss H. M. Reed of San Francisco. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas West of St. Louis go round the links every day. Mr. and Mrs. Trafford Huteson from Seattle are getting in some excellent work. Miss Elizabeth Baillee and Mrs. William Jones from Tacoma have had some jolly matches. Miss Lee Girvin and her mother are often seen on the links and Mr. Richard Girvin enjoys going around as often as possible during his week-end visits. Prominent among the local players who have taken up golf again after the winter rains are Mrs. James H. Parke, Mrs. George Eckhardt and Mrs. Brim. Mrs. Eckhardt is one of the best tennis players on the peninsula.

Queen Alexandra's Secret

Our girls who go to the coronation will see the Dowager Queen Alexandra and knowing her age, will doubtless be surprised at her youthful appearance. In order that they may be properly posted I shall give them the secret of this matter.

Queen Alexandra never touches red meat. She eats only chicken, turkey, duck and game. The vegetables she has served to her are cabbage, spinach, peas and beans. She does not eat pudding or pastry and for dessert has simply fruit cooked or uncooked and nuts and raisins. She is particularly fond of nuts and has been known to make an entire luncheon of almonds and walnuts dipped in salt. She eats toast rather than bread and very little butter, but quantities of cream. She drinks nothing but hot milk, having given up tea, coffee, cocoa and wines years ago. On this diet with a moderate amount of exercise Queen Alexandra keeps wonderfully well and preserves a girlish symmetry of figure and softness of skin which makes it difficult to realize that she is well past sixty.

Bridge in Honolulu

There is quite a difference after all between men and women and the way they do things, in spite of all the learned arguments of the suffragettes and the husbandettes concerning the equality of the sexes, says the Bystander of the Hawaiian Gazette. For example, the following: There is a lady in Honolulu, a recent arrival, who has been received with open arms by island Society—capital S—because she is a society woman and has been a leader among those who call themselves the Smart Set—more capitals—in larger cities than Honolulu. Recently, having accepted a daintily penned invitation to "lunch and bridge," she found herself, with three other ladies, shuffling and cutting and saying "May I play," and "Pray do," and the other things that distinguish bridge from such vulgar games as pinocle and draw. The game came to an end, as all things do, when one of the players passed a slip of paper over to the guest. From it she read: "You owe four dollars." Puzzled, she glanced at her vis-a-vis and asked: "Do you intend this for me?" "Oh, yes," was smiled back. "You owe four dollars. See, here is the score." "But there must be some mistake," said the newcomer. "Do you mean that I have played and lost four dollars?" "Yes, you owe four dollars." "Well, I'm sure there must be some mistake. I cannot owe you anything, because I never play for money." "Oh, but you do owe four dollars. That's what the score makes it." "I'm sorry. Will you kindly get the four dollars from my husband? He is in the next room. He'll be interested, I know, in learning that I have been playing for money." There the incident closed. Which shows the difference between the man who invites you to "take a hand" and the woman who invites another to "bridge." Both want your coin, but the man makes clear what the stakes are before the game begins and gives everyone a chance to see that there are no cold decks about. The woman frequently doesn't, because she is a lady.

English Women Boxers

One never knows how far a fad may travel. One is never sure of the ultimate consequences of one's unconsidered actions. Did Tommy Sears dream, for instance, when she put on a pair of boxing gloves at Burlingame and sparred for a couple of rounds with Walter Hobart, that the news of her exploit would cross a continent and an ocean and start a boxing fad among English women? I think it is safe to say that Eleonor, not being a girl of deep reflective character, never gave the matter a thought. But just the same English women have taken up boxing and if they did not get the idea from "Tommy," whence in the name of British imitativeness, did they derive it? British boxing instructors give lessons to many of the athletic maids in London society, which is not entirely surprising, for society maids must rout ennui at all costs. They also give lessons to British matrons, which must be at least a trifle disconcerting to the husbands who, naturally, cannot all be as handy in the Queensbury science as "Bobby" Beresford. One of the instructors deigned to talk on the subject recently. "The reckless way," he said, "in which some of my pupils risk black eyes and cut lips is astonishing. The married ladies are very apt. Nothing seems to please them more than a short bout with their husbands, and as most of them seem to have an innate idea that offense is the best defense the husbands usually have to be fully on their guard. In the matter of hitting straight from the shoulder I do not find women very apt pupils. When a woman has a man opposed to her she is inclined to give downward hammer blows precedence over all else." All this is calculated to produce an uncomfortable feeling among mere men. A wife with an "innate idea" about "hammer blows" does not inspire perfect confidence. One hopes the fashion will not take too strong a hold. But for the benefit of possible neophytes it may be explained that the proper costume consists of "five ounce gloves, blue serge shorts and longish loose coats."

In the Social Spotlight

The managers of the San Francisco Nursery for Homeless Children which will have a pencil sale on April 6, 7 and 8 announce that they will take advance orders. Mrs. William Kaufmann has her headquarters at the St. Francis and will take charge of all orders.

Mrs. Alfred Roncovieri, wife of the Superintendent of Schools, and Mrs. W. E. Trefts, her daughter-in-law, have gone East for a few months. Mrs. Roncovieri will visit friends in New York and relatives in Harrisburg. The principal object of her trip East is to visit her sons Alfred and Louis Roncovieri who are both medical students in the University of Pennsylvania. She will remain in Philadelphia for some time in order to be present at the graduation of her son Dr. Alfred E. Roncovieri Jr., from the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania.

Dr. J. Auburn Wiborn and Mrs. Wiborn have returned from a two months' visit in the Eastern States. They have taken apartments at the Hotel Victoria.

Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Thomas (formerly Mrs. Frank J. Gould) who are at the Fairmont en route to New York from the Orient on their honeymoon trip, are the guests of honor at many merry little luncheon and dinner parties.

Mrs. John Baker Jr. entertained half a hundred guests at a tea at the Palace on Saturday in honor of Mrs. J. C. Meyerstein and Miss May Sullivan.

H. B. Davenport, a mining man from Mexico, is registered at the Hotel Victoria.

George R. Atkinson, a business man of Rockford, Ill., is among the arrivals at the Hotel Victoria.

Mrs. David H. Patterson and Miss Marjorie Patterson of Cleveland and Mrs. L. L. Valentine of Chicago were among the week's arrivals at the Hotel Victoria.

One of the week's theater parties at the Savoy given by Mrs. Harold Bloom was followed by an informal tea at the St. Francis.

Mrs. Josiah Myrick of Portland accompanied by her two daughters, Miss Elizabeth and Miss Winifred, is at the Fairmont, coming from Los Angeles.

The first rehearsal of a society vaudeville, to be given in April, was held at the St. Francis this week. A score of young people were present under the chaperonage of Mrs. John Metcalfe. Among the clever amateurs who will take part are Mrs. Fred Kohl, Miss Edith Metcalfe, Miss Florence Braverman, Roy Folger and George de Long.

Miss Marie Louise Elkins has returned to the Fairmont after spending a short time out of town with friends. She entertained a group of young people at dinner on Friday.

The seventh anniversary of the Cap and Bells Club was celebrated at the St. Francis with an elaborate breakfast. Mrs. D. E. F. Easton acted as the hostess.

Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Worden entertained at dinner during the week at the Fairmont, among the dozen or more guests being Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. Tubbs and Mr. and Mrs. Sam Buckbee.

As to "The Old Curiosity Shop"

By Edward F. O'Day

Max Figman's version of "The Old Curiosity Shop" is not entirely satisfactory. But that need not daunt Mr. Figman. No stage version of a Dickens story ever was entirely satisfactory; and no stage version ever will be entirely satisfactory to lovers of Charles Dickens. The lovers of Charles Dickens are an exacting legion. George Moore once said that the world was divided into two classes; those who did and those who did not read Balzac. Similarly the English-speaking world might be divided into those who love Charles Dickens and those who do not. Those of us who love Charles Dickens barely tolerate those who do not. We are apt to be dogmatic in the matter. We feel that not to love Charles Dickens argues a defect of character or an error in bringing-up. And knowing his men and women much more intimately than many living men and women with whom we constantly associate, we do not like to see them tampered with. The playwright has to tamper with them. No matter how reverent his treatment of the story and the dialogue he has to hack and cut to bring the text within the narrow limits of stage requirements. The playwright who can hack and cut Charles Dickens to the satisfaction of Dickensians has not been born. What lover of Dickens was ever satisfied with "Oliver Twist" or "The Only Way"? Yet these are better plays than Max Figman's "Old Curiosity Shop." Mr. Figman's intentions were of the best, I have no doubt. We have been told that he took all his lines from the text of the story and that seems to be true in the main. We are also told that he studied the Cruikshank pictures to insure fidelity of portraiture. Those Cruikshank pictures have been mentioned again and again. Even the critics have admired Figman's felicity in breathing stage life into those Cruikshank pictures Now this gives real sorrow to a lover of Dickens. It argues faulty knowledge on the part of Mr. Figman and the press agent and—shall I commit laesa majestas if I add?—on the part of the critics. For Cruikshank did not make the "Old Curiosity Shop" pictures. Cruikshank, as every lover of Dickens knows, made the pictures for the "Sketches by Boz" and "Oliver Twist." But the pictures for "The Old Curiosity Shop" were made by Cattermole and by "Phiz," the great, the inimitable Hablot Browne. This may seem a trivial slip, but all lovers of Dickens know that it is of transcendent importance. What would Dickens be without "Phiz"? No lover of Dickens can hear the question without emotion. It was "Phiz" who fixed for all ages the popular conception of Sam Weller, David Copperfield, Traddles, Steerforth, Newman Noggs, Mr. Mantalini, Captain Cuttle, Florence Dombey, Toots, Tom Pinch, Pecksniff and hundreds of others in that marvelous gallery which stands alone in literature. When you slight "Phiz" you anger not only the lovers of Charles Dickens but the lovers of Charles Lever as well, for "Phiz" gave us Charles O'Malley and Mickey Free, Lucy Dashwood, Harry Lorrequer and Jack Hinton. By all means let us not forget "Phiz" when we write of "The Old Curiosity Shop." When the first curtain goes up and we see the old man in the midst of his treasures, we immediately think of "Phiz." The bewildering wealth of old armor, old furniture, gewgaws, knicknacks, "infinite treasures in a little room" that we associate with the old curiosity shop of "Boz" and "Phiz" were imperfectly pictured by the carefully considered disarray on the Alcazar stage. But the old grandfather and the little Nell carried the illusion of Dickens and "Phiz"; there can be no doubt of that. And the Quilp of Wesner and the Swiveller of Figman were real, remarkably real. Sampson Brass was not so good and Kit was not my idea of Kit. In the second act we met Sally Brass, clever in makeup but lacking in the venom that makes Sally one of the most hateful of Dickens women. But we also met the Marchioness of imagination. Every time Bessie Barriscale snuffled we were in Dickensland. In the third act we were presented to another of the great characters, Mrs. Jarley, but Adele Belgarde was never meant to portray the great original of Madame Tussaud. The best scenes were the Swiveller and Marchioness scenes of course. The play was built for these two characters and for Quilp. But Quilp is too prominent. One who was unfamiliar with the story might think that Quilp's villainy dominated the book. It was far from doing that. Dickens did not engage Quilp in a senseless hounding of Kit and Swiveller. These were subsidiary incidents of the story, but they are very prominent in the play. What is supposed to be the big scene, the fight between Quilp and Swiveller, is quite inane. Why was it dragged in? Neither Figman nor Wesner is impressive in rough-and-tumble. The whole thing is very funny, although not meant that way. The last act is nearly all Swiveller and the Marchioness, so it is good. But the whole thing would have been more acceptable if it had been called "Dick Swiveller" instead of "The Old Curiosity Shop." A play of the latter name should have more of Little Nell in it. All of which probably indicates what I remarked in the beginning; that no lover of Dickens can be entirely satisfied with a Dickens play. Just the same I wouldn't have missed the Alcazar production for a great deal.

Irresistible Marie Dressler

There is no laughter in the man who does not chortle at Marie Dressler. Cachinnation is her handmaiden and the loud guffaw pages her footsteps. Silent she is funny and funnier still when she opens her mouth. Her face is a scream and her figure a screech. When you are not laughing with her you are laughing at her. She is the assassin of dignity. The American stage has no woman more undignified, but she is never cheap, never vulgar. Her fun is wholesome beyond all other things. You are never for a moment sorry that you enjoyed it. A large body awkwardly handled is not always funny. In a woman it is apt to be the reverse of funny. But Marie Dressler is so large, so awkward and withal so naturally good natured about it, that she extracts the quintessence of physical fun. Seasickness is supposed to be funny, but rarely indeed do the jokes based upon it hit the funnybone. They are frequently quite disgusting. But Marie Dressler shows us the throes of the malady and never offends. And the most finicky cannot object to her exhibition of a "souse." I heard many criticisms of Cheridah Simpson's "souse"; I have yet to hear any of Miss Dressler's. Miss Dressler is saved by her personality which is healthy and exceedingly human. Her personality is all of "Tillie's Nightmare." Without her there would be no excuse for "Tillie's Nightmare"; with her in the cast there would have been an excuse even for "The Midnight Sons." She is bound to be the whole show wherever she appears. And physically as well as artistically she is a big show, a show to discourage the blues and to correct our overdrawn notions of personal dignity which, after all, is not the most important quality in human nature.

MARIE DRESSLER

Ruth St. Denis at Columbia

The program of dances which Ruth St. Denis will give during her engagement at the Columbia beginning Monday night, is more elaborate than any in which this artist has ever before appeared. For her engagements in the East she gave only the Egyptian or Hindu dances, but for her engagement here she will do the most notable of all her creations. Miss St. Denis has in her large company a band of Hindus including a special orchestra of Hindu musicians. The dances in which she appears are very different from anything of the kind ever given in this city before. This engagement will probably afford the only opportunity for local theatregoers to see this American girl who has made a world name for herself, as at the conclusion of the present season she will go abroad.
